LONDON, NOVEMBER 6, 1869.

WE UNDERSTAND that the vacancy occasioned by the death of the late Lord Justice Selwyn will not be filled up, at any rate during the present year.

WE PRINT THIS WEEK an account of the twenty-second annual meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, held at York. The forty-third annual meeting of the Incorporated Law Association of Liverpool was held on Wednesday, the 3rd inst., at the Law Association's rooms in Cook-street, Liverpool. The election of officers takes place on Monday next. In our next week's issue we shall report the proceedings.

THE PROSECUTION of the Rev. Mr. Bennett, now pending in the Court of Arches, raises some important questions of law and practice as well as of doctrine, which, singularly enough, when the late unhappy frequency of ecclesiastical suits is taken into account, still remain unsettled. Mr. Bennett has had articles exhibited against him for a great variety of alleged heresies, and among others for having expressed an opinion contravening the 29th article of religion "of the wicked which eat not the body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper." To this last charge the Dean of the Arches, whose duty it is, in the absence of the accused clerk, to see that no improper articles are admitted, has taken two objections:—First, that it was not specifically alleged in the letters of request from the Bishop of Bath and Wells to the Arches Court, nor in the opinion of the judge could it be gathered from them by necessary implication; secondly, that, even assuming the letters of request stated the charge sufficiently, it was not a subject of inquiry before the commissioners on whose report those letters issued. Now, there can be little doubt that the first objection is well founded, if the learned Dean of the Arches' construction of the letters of request be the true one. They are the foundation of the suit, and the articles must not go beyond them in any particular (Brecks v. Woolfrey, 1 Curteis, 880; Simpson v. Flawank, 16 W. R. 8); a wise and salutary rule, which is also applicable to the citation or decree following the reception of the letters of request, and which prevents a defendant from being taken by surprise. But on the second point there is room for doubt, as there is no direct authority upon it. That the law ought to be as the judge has decided that it is, seems only fair and reasonable. The letters of request are issued upon the report of the commissioners. Surely they ought not to contain charges which have never been before the commissioners at all. Such a construction of the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86), would render the issuing of a commission an idle and useless form. On the other hand the counsel for the promoters argue that when once a commission of inquiry has reported against a clergyman, the suit instituted may include any charge the promoter may choose to bring. Nor is such a contention without foundation, inasmuch as there is no absolute need for a commission of inquiry to report at all. The bishop may send a case, by letters of request, to the Court of Appeal, either "in the first instance or after the commissioners shall have reported" (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, s. 13). Still, whenever he does deem it expedient to appoint commissioners, and they make a report, it appears to us to be somewhat unjust to include any charges in the articles which are not in the report. We shall therefore be glad if the Privy Council find themselves able to affirm the judgment of Sir R. Phillimore on this matter. The question is entirely novel, the Privy Council having, on the only occasion on which it has been before them hitherto, expressly declined to decide it (Bonwell v. Bishop of London, 14 Moo. P. C. 395).

THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH has refused to release the prisoners committed for contempt by the Beverley commissioners. The ground of this decision was that the commissioners had, by the Act of Parliament, power to sit "from time to time," so that the sitting at which the prisoners had been committed might be treated as a good sitting newly appointed by the commissioners, even if their former sittings could not be deemed to have been properly continued to that day by regular adjournments. The case, of course, depended entirely upon the construction to be put on the statute, and as usual the point was one which evidently was not contemplated at all by the Legislature. There were, therefore, some passages in the statute from which it might be argued that the intention of the Legislature was in favour of one view, and other passages from which a contrary intention might be inferred. On the whole there seemed sufficient to justify the Court in arriving at the conclusion which they did, and of course it was most satisfactory that they were able to do so.

The whole affair has been an unfortunate one, not the least unsatisfactory circumstance in connection with it being the manner in which it has been taken up as a party question. Because the Commissioners at Beverley had succeeded in discovering a greater amount of corruption on the Conservative side than on the Liberal, it was thought not unbecoming by writers in the Conservative newspapers to rail at the commissioners pretty smartly for their conduct, the illegality of which was almost taken for granted; and it was currently reported that, in the event of an Act of Parliament having been found to be requisite to make valid the acts of the commissioners, and to enable them to make their report, it would have been opposed by the strength of the Conservative party. On the other hand the Liberal press have quite as recklessly supported the Commissioners, and in some cases, in commenting on the decision of the Queen's Bench, go so far as to say that the Court have decided that the conduct of the Commissioners was perfectly legal. This most certainly they did not do, because although the Court held that the Commissioners had, at the time they committed the prisoners, their statutory powers, the judges expressly refrained from deciding that they had them at the meeting at which only two were present. Indeed they expressed the strongest possible opinion that the two Commissioners had not the power to act alone, and that the meeting in question was irregular. This opinion, of course, being in the view taken of the Act not necessary to the decision of the case before the Court, was extrajudicial. The only result of the informality probably is that the witnesses examined before two Commissioners only could not be convicted of perjury.

Bribery will never be put down as long as either the general question, or the discussion of particular cases, are taken up as party matters. It is surprising that political partisans do not see that either to palliate or attempt to interfere with the detection of corruption committed or supposed to be committed in the interest of their own party, or to make corruption committed in the interest of the opposite party a ground of party complaint, is equally compromising to themselves. As long as neither party can boast that the hands of all its members are clean, which recent revelations as well as former ones show to be the case, it cannot be to the advantage of partisans on either side to argue that members of the opposite party are responsible for the acts of all its members. It would be far better for them sternly to repudiate all connection with corrupt political associates, and rather to encourage their opponents to do the same, than to taunt them into their defence. No man will be deterred from bribery by fear of the bad opinion of his opponents, though he may by fear of that of his friends; and it is after all to the formation of a sounder public opinion rather than to coercive measures that we must look for the repression of bribery.

We understand that, notwithstanding the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, this matter is not to be allowed to drop. It is reported that an application will shortly be made either to the Court of Exchequer or of Common Pleas. This it is competent to the parties to do, but obviously their chance of success is much diminished by the fact of their having made an unsuccessful application elsewhere.

The Bridgwater Commissioners are now also before the Court of Queen's Bench, a rule having been granted yesterday calling upon them to show cause why a mandamus should not issue directing them to give a certificate of indemnity to Mr. Henry Lovibond, solicitor, of Bridgwater. Upon the argument of this rule the questions will arise, first, whether the Commissioners have a discretion as to granting or withholding the certificate; and secondly, supposing they have no discretion in cases where the evidence of the witness is both full and true, which rather seems to be the construction to be put upon the Act, whether they are not the sole judges of the fulness and truth of the evidence. It certainly seems a little inconvenient that an issue should be raised upon the return to a mandamus as to whether or not certain evidence was true.

A CASE HAS JUST BEEN TRIED in the Salisbury County Court which demands attention. The plaintiff was the station-master of the South-Western Railway at Milford, the defendant a sergeant of the Salisbury police. The plaintiff sued the defendant for damages for false imprisonment under the following circumstances:—The plaintiff, when returning one night from a croquet party with a friend, was arrested by the defendant, charged with being drunk and riotous, hurried off to the station-house, and locked up for the night. In the morning the magistrates dismissed the charge against the plaintiff, although two or three policemen, including the defendant, swore that he was drunk and riotous. Thereupon the plaintiff brought the action in question. When the plaintiff's case had been stated, Mr. Collins, who appeared for the defendant, said that his client would admit that he had exceeded his duty, would withdraw the charges of drunkenness and riotous conduct against the plaintiff, and would consent to a verdict for £5 and costs. Thus the case ended, as far as the Court was concerned, but the public have a right to know what course the authorities are going to take with respect to the members of the police force who swore so positively to what was afterwards retracted, and whether these and similar cases will not induce criminal courts to adopt the theory of Mr. Taylor in his "Treatise on the Law of Evidence," that the testimony of policemen should be "watched with care."

COMPLAINTS HAVE BEEN MADE of the manner in which some of the business on the Northern Circuit has to be disposed of. It is well known to practitioners that at Manchester alone there are frequently nearly a hundred causes for trial, and at Liverpool half as many more, so that it is absolutely impossible for the judges upon this circuit adequately to dispose of this mass of business within the allotted space of time.

Two suggestions have been made by way of remedy. First, that in the present dearth of election business two of the election petition judges (one being left in town) might go this circuit as extra judicial strength to meet an acknowledged necessity; and secondly, that Lancaster, Manchester, Liverpool, and Appleby might be formed into a separate circuit, with, if it were thought desirable, York and Leeds taken from the Midland, the two election petition judges in their turn going this circuit. Just at present, no doubt, two election judges could well be told off for the work, but what would become of the extra circuit after a general election?

IT IS STATED IN THE Post Magazine and Insurance Monitor that when the business of the Medical Invalid and General Assurance Office was transferred to the Albert Company in 1860, a deed was executed by which the funds of the former society were assigned to trustees upon trust to pay the claims as they arose under the policies, with power to release in favour of the Albert such portion of the fund as applied to policies surrendered or exchanged, and to pay over to the Albert the remainder of the fund at the expiration of ten years from the date of the deed. It is stated that the trustees of this fund hold between £30,000 and £35,000. On Thursday last, in a suit of Foot v. Hopkinson, instituted by a shareholder in the Medical Company against the trustees for the administration of this fund, Vice-Chancellor Malins made an order for a receiver.

A SOMEWHAT NOVEL APPLICATION was made yesterday to Vice-Chancellor Stuart. Counsel moved, ex parte, for an injunction under the following circumstances:—A solicitor sought to stay the issuing out of a cheque by the Accountant-General, except upon the terms of his claim for taxed costs being provided for. He had acted for a creditor in the cause, to whom the cheque was ready to be paid. It was admitted that no petition for a charging order had been presented, but an offer was made to correct this in the course of the day. The Vice-Chancellor said he had never heard of such an application by an attorney against his client. It seemed to him the plaintiff was remitted to his remedies under the Attorneys and Solicitors Act. Counsel said the solicitor did not know where to serve the creditor, and it was only necessary for such creditor to be identified by a solicitor in the course of the day, to obtain the money. The Vice-Chancellor made the order, the solicitor undertaking to be answerable in damages.

"CHANCERY RETRENCHMENT."

Our readers will have seen in our last volume* a copy of a notice which appeared some time ago in the Times under the heading of "Chancery Retrenchment." The article in question displays such profound ignorance as well of the past history of the court as of the present state of business there, that we might well have considered it unnecessary to notice it further had it not come to our knowledge that it is not intended for the present to fill up the vacancy on the Bench caused by Sir Charles Selwyn's death. This determination on the part of the Government leads us to fear that the proposition put forward in the Times finds more favour with them than it deserves, and with the recollection of the narrowness of our late escape (if we have in fact escaped) from the proposed change of site of the New Law Courts, we deem it desirable to call attention to the proposal of the Times at once, in order, if possible, to prevent any action from being taken upon it.

It is proposed, in effect, to reduce the number of the equity judges of first instance by one, by simply converting the Master of the Rolls into an appellate judge. The author of this notable scheme appears to be ignorant that when Lord Chancellor Cranworth, in 1866, presented a bill to the House of Lords for this very purpose, it was opposed by every other law lord in the House at the time (including Lord Romilly himself), on the ground that the official duties of the Master of the Rolls were such as could not be so conveniently associated with the judicial duties of an appellate judge as with those of a judge of first instance, and the bill was accordingly withdrawn. True, that bill proposed to create a fourth Vice-Chancellor, and did not thus far possess the merit (?) of seeking to impede the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery; the court of which we hear, on the one hand, that the delays are all but interminable, and on the other, through the wisacre who writes in the Times, that "the powers of primary jurisdiction are in excess of the requirements of the public." To the extraordinary allegations on this point made by the Times we will refer by-and-bye, but at present we desire to point out that in the opinion of Lord Romilly himself, as evidenced by his conduct on the occasion we have mentioned, if the staff of equity judges of first instance be susceptible of reduction, that reduction should not be effected by any interference with the office of Master of the Rolls, but by abolishing thereto that of the Vice-Chancellor appointed under the provisions of the Masters in Chancery Abolition Act. Of course, if it be desirable that Lord Romilly should be the new Lord Justice, and if his Lordship consent, we are not to be understood as offering any opposition to his appointment; but this should not, we think, be effected in the manner proposed, but by a simple appointment of Lord Romilly as Lord Justice, and the appointment of some other person to be Master of Rolls. If this appointment were given to one of the present Vice-Chancellors the proposed reduction would be effected as completely as, and far more conveniently than, by the method advocated in the Times.

This, however, assumes that four judges of first instance are too numerous for the requirements of the court. The Times says:—

It is well known by practitioners in the Chancery Courts that the powers of primary jurisdiction are in excess of the requirements of the public, and that the delay, small as it now is comparatively with times of old, is occasioned by the inadequacy of strength to the work required in the equity chambers; in fact, the equity courts in this country have become only compilers and extractors of bewildered account-books—a duty properly of those gentlemen who inhabit accountants' chambers. The actual equity business relating to property is now so small that the institution of Vice-Chancellors has, in truth, become unnecessary, and even with the other court cases there is a difficulty in distributing it so as to give even an apparent work in court to the four junior equity judges, though their chambers are thronged with expectant and disappointed suitors. The points of law for argument and decision by the judges in court are so few in comparison with the inquiries by their clerks that despair often marks the countenance of the gentlemen learned in the law. It is obvious, then, that the proper course is to reduce the number of judges while increasing the staff of those who remain.

A short Act could declare the Master of the Rolls for the time being to be chief judge of the Court of Appeal in Chancery; that his chief clerks, with their staff, should be assigned between the Vice-Chancellors as additional officers in chambers by a general order in chancery; that the Lord Chancellor and Vice-Chancellors should, by general orders, distribute all primary jurisdiction matters between the Vice-Chancellors.

No additional officers are required, and the salaries of the present holders are already subject to the Treasury: neither are new courts required, those now attached to the Rolls' Court being confessedly the best in use, an arm-chair for the junior judge of appeal being the only article of furniture with which the country need be charged."

Passing over the trifling difficulty of seeing how a redistribution of the chief clerks among three instead of four judges, their number remaining the same, could in any manner relieve the "chambers thronged with expectant and disappointed suitors," we beg leave to take issue with the Times on the point which forms the very foundation of the whole argument.

In the first place, practitioners in chancery are well aware, as has been frequently shown in these columns, that what is really wanted is more judicial power in chambers, —not that more work should be done in court, but that more of the work which is done in chambers should be done by the judge,—and that a distribution of the same number of chief clerks over a greater, instead of a less, number of judges would be an efficient, and the only efficient, remedy for much of the evil which still exists. We quite agree that this evil is "small comparatively with times of old," but the scheme proposed in the Times would tend greatly to aggravate it. But, secondly, it is not true that there are too many judges for the court work. The cause lists just published show that 363 causes (to say nothing of motions, petitions, and—most prolific of all—adjourned summonses) are now set down, and waiting for hearing during this term. As the term consists of but 18 working days, of which 4 are devoted to motions and 3 to petitions in each court, there are but 11 clear days to dispose of all these causes, if there is to be no delay, which would involve the disposal of 33 causes a day, or an average of 8 per judge per diem, which far exceeds the judicial rapidity even of the Master of the Rolls himself. In point of fact, it may be reckoned on as certain that not less than one-third (more probably half) of them will remain over till next sittings, while, in the meantime, a new crop of litigation will have "ripened" in turn, to be in turn delayed till their predecessors are disposed of.

But not only is the writer in the Times thus ignorant as well of the actual state of business in court as of the previous history of this particular question, but he makes one or two other somewhat curious statements, from which, on the principle of "ex pede Herculem," we may conclude that he has no acquaintance whatever either with the Court or the subject.

Suppose his notable scheme carried out, he says it will cost the country nothing but "an arm chair for the junior judge of appeal." But how will it cost that? What does he suppose that Lord Justice Giffard now sits upon? The slip is but a small one, but it leads us to the conclusion that the writer probably never has set his foot in the court in his life.

Again, what is meant by "the Act passed in consequence of the illness of Lord Justice Rolt"? No such Act ever was passed. The Act which is, we presume, referred to was passed in consequence of the delays and arrears caused by the long illness of Lord Justice Turner, and was taken charge of in the House of Commons by Lord Justice Rolt, then Attorney-General. It was extensively used by Lord Cairns and Lord Justice Rolt, but afterwards fell into disuse, not having been, we believe, resorted to on any occasion by Lord Justice Wood or Lord Justice Selwyn, and never having been used by Lord Justice Giffard till after his late colleague had become unable to sit. The practice thereby introduced is generally admitted to be more honoured in the breach than in the observance, and should, we think, be kept for sudden and temporary emergencies. Such was the feeling of Lord Justice Rolt himself, who, when he found that his illness was more than temporary, did not consider that the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cairns could efficiently dispose of the business in the manner now suggested, and preferred to abandon his own position rather than inflict upon the country a state of things with the continuance of which for at least two months longer we are now threatened at the instance of the Times.

We regret that the Government should have been weak enough to give way even to that extent; we trust that this may be the limit of our loss, and that we may not have to meet a repetition of the tactics displayed in the "battle of the sites."

COVENANTS TO SETTLE AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

NO. 1.

There are few clauses in marriage settlements of the ordinary type which give rise to so much litigation as the covenant to settle a wife's after-acquired property. This is to a great extent accounted for by the simple fact that the clause in question attempts to provide in a few words for all the various modes and circumstances in or under which property may come to the wife, so that few, or it may be none, of those which actually happen are in any particular case consciously present to the mind of the draughtsman. It must, however, be confessed that the latter is not altogether free from blame in the matter, for, while the numerous and sometimes over-subtle distinctions which have been taken render care in this clause especially needful, it is usually the worst drawn portion of the settlement. We propose by a short digest of the more recent decisions on the subject at the same time to guard our readers against negligence in framing the covenant in question, and to show the interpretations which have been given to some of the forms in which it is frequently expressed.

The most convenient mode of doing this seems to be to take some well-settled form and point out the effect of its component parts as they stand, and of slight variations in them. There is no substantial difference between the precedents given in Prideaux's and Davidson's collections, but the latter, and forms more nearly resembling it, are more common, and we therefore select it. Want of space restricts us to giving the precedent piecemeal in this and subsequent articles, but we recommend our readers who are not already sufficiently familiar with the general outline of the covenant in question to refer to a precedent of it.

And it is hereby agreed and declared, &c. In Prideaux's form the clause is introduced as a separate witnessing part of the deed, and the husband and wife are each made in terms to covenant with the trustees. It will be seen presently that the difference is not a material one if the subsequent part of the clause is framed in the usual way.

In many of the early cases there is a covenant by the husband only—perhaps because it was thought that the wife's covenant would be merged by the coverture; but, although she could not be sued on it at law during the

coverture, her liability would revive on her husband's death, and she would always be bound in equity. The extension of the covenant to the wife in terms or in substance is essential, in order—(1) to bind property to which the wife becomes during the coverture entitled to her separate use, and (2), in the case of his dying before her, to bind interests which vested during the coverture, but were not reduced into possession by him. Thus, in Douglas v. Congreve (1 Keen, 428), a covenant by H. that he would settle or concur in settling was held inapplicable to property left to W. for her separate use, and see Grey v. Stuart (2 Giff. 398); and (2) in Reid v. Kenrick (3 W. R. 530) a covenant that H. would settle and join with W. in settling was held not to bind a reversionary interest in property falling in after H.'s death; and see Young v. Smith (1 Eq. 100). The form adopted by Mr. Davidson consists of an agreement and declaration that H. and W. and all necessary parties will settle. There has been a good deal of argument as to the effect of the words, "it is agreed and declared," and in Ramsden v. Smith (2 W. R. 435, 2 Dr. 307) it was contended that they operated so as to bind separate property of W., although followed only by a covenant by H. to settle or concur with W. in settling. This contention failed, the rule laid down by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley being that such words amount only to a covenant by the party who according to the instrument containing them is to do or not to do something, and H. there was alone to do anything. But he admitted that a covenant that the property should be settled by all proper parties would come within the rule. (It was so held in Butcher v. Butcher, 14 Beav. 222, the covenant being in form by H. alone.) To this effect is the decision of Lord Justice Wood in Willoughby v. Middleton (10 W. R. 460, 2 J. & H. 344) that an agreement by all parties that property shall be dealt with in a particular way is a covenant by those parties whose concurrence is required to give effect to the provision. The usual recital of the agreement that after-acquired property should be settled, although it may be used as a key to the construction where the operative part has been doubtfully expressed, will be governed by the latter if unambiguous; and therefore in Hammond v. Hammond (3 W. R. 36, 19 Beav. 29) property settled to the separate use of W. was held not to be affected by a settlement reciting that it was agreed that all property of W., or H. in her right, should be settled, but containing a covenant by H. alone.

That if W. now is, or if during the said intended coverture she or H. in her right shall [at one and the same time and from the same source] become seized or possessed of or entitled to any real or personal property [of the value of £ and upwards] for any estate or interest whatsoever. . . . Omitting for the present the consideration of the words within brackets a glance at the above sentence will show that the title at the head of this article does not fully express the scope of the covenant we are discussing, extending as it does not only to after-acquired property but to omitted interests. There can be very little doubt that as a general rule where a settlement goes so far as to protect the future property of the wife, it was intended that all her property at the time of the marriage should be settled, but cases of course are not unfrequent where either from some slip on the part of the conveyancer, imperfect instructions, ignorance of all parties as to the existence of some of the wife's property, which, as in the possible case of a fortune being left to her by a person dying on the eve of the marriage, may be unavoidable, and other accidents which may be imagined, the settlement itself does not include all such existing interests. When, therefore, words of futurity alone are used in the covenant it would seem difficult to treat it as applicable to property belonging to the wife at the time of the marriage, but as the Court is always anxious to protect the wife and children of the marriage it will, unless the recitals indicate a contrary intention, consider such words as "vesting thereafter in H. in right of W." as applicable to the wife's existing property to which the husband became on the marriage titled, extended to a vested reversionary interest in stock on the singular ground that on the marriage she became "entitled during the coverture."

In Archer v. Kelly (1 Dr. & Sm. 300, 8 W. R. 684), the same Vice-Chancellor again expressed his disapprobation of the decisions in Graffley v. Humpage and James v. Durant, contending that the words becoming entitled clearly did not point to the husband's becoming entitled to a right which the wife already had and that to such an argument it might be retorted that the husband would not become entitled during but immediately on the commencement of the coverture. In this case the covenant was to settle property to which W. or H. in his right should become entitled during the coverture, and was held to cover a contingent remainder in real estate which vested in possession during the coverture, but not a present interest in stock. The ground for including the former was that it vested in W. during the coverture for a new interest, and on the same the decisions in Blythe v. Granville and a case of Ex parte Blake (16 Beav. 463), where property which should thereafter during the coverture descend, come to, or vest in W. or H. in her right was held to include the proceeds of land taken by a railway company to which W. was at the time of the marriage (as was long afterwards discovered) entitled in reversion, may perhaps be supported. In Spring v. Pride (12 W. R. 893) the Lord Justice Knight Bruce observed that the words "devolve" and "come" were not inaccurately applicable to reversionary interests falling into possession. So, in Brooks v. Keith (1 Dr. & Sm. 462, 9 W. R. 565) a contingent interest afterwards vesting was held bound by a similar covenant to the last, and Vice-Chancellor Stuart, in Maclurean v. Lane (7 W. R. 135), went so far as to decide that by a covenant to settle property which should accrue to or vest in H. as estate tail in remainder, subject to preceding estates and a power of appointment, was bound on its vesting in possession; but in Churchill v. Shepherd (33 Beav. 107), the words "should vest" were properly considered inapplicable to a sum due to W. at, but not ascertained until some years after, the marriage.

It must be noticed that Vice-Chancellor Stuart, in Re Hughes's Trusts (4 Giff. 432), approved of James v. Durant and Graffley v. Humpage, and held that a reversionary interest in stock falling in after the deaths of both H. and W. was within a covenant where the words "become entitled during the coverture" only were used, but the decision cannot stand consistently with Archer v. Kelly, or with a recent case (Re Browne's Will, L. R. 7 Eq. 231, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 6) decided by the Master of the Rolls, in which the words "shall become possessed of or entitled to" were held insufficient to include an interest in some contingent debentures of and to which the wife was at the marriage possessed and entitled, but under which, by reason of the life named in them surviving other lives a considerable sum became, some years after the settlement, payable. The Master of the Rolls considered that a covenant containing only the above words could not be held to apply to the increasing value of existing property, and that the like interest would not, under the same circumstances, be bound by a covenant referring only to property which should during the coverture be given to or in any manner vest in the wife.

It is obvious that the covenant only applies to property which the husband takes in right of his wife in the sense that she would have taken it but for the marriage, and not to an interest in property expressly left on the wife's death to a surviving husband. The question, however, was raised in Ibberson v. Grote (25 Beav. 17). A covenant to settle property to which H. and W. or either in right of W. should become entitled during the coverture is also inapplicable to property left to H. and W. as joint-tenants, for W.'s reversionary interest could not fall in during the coverture, and the interest during the joint lives is in H. in his own right (Edye v. Addison, 12 W. R. 97).

The words "during their joint lives" are sometimes

quence of the illness of Lord Justice Rolt"? No such Act ever was passed. The Act which is, we presume, referred to was passed in consequence of the delays and arrears caused by the long illness of Lord Justice Turner, and was taken charge of in the House of Commons by Lord Justice Rolt, then Attorney-General. It was extensively used by Lord Cairns and Lord Justice Rolt, but afterwards fell into disuse, not having been, we believe, resorted to on any occasion by Lord Justice Wood or Lord Justice Selwyn, and never having been used by Lord Justice Giffard till after his late colleague had become unable to sit. The practice thereby introduced is generally admitted to be more honoured in the breach than in the observance, and should, we think, be kept for sudden and temporary emergencies. Such was the feeling of Lord Justice Rolt himself, who, when he found that his illness was more than temporary, did not consider that the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cairns could efficiently dispose of the business in the manner now suggested, and preferred to abandon his own position rather than inflict upon the country a state of things with the continuance of which for at least two months longer we are now threatened at the instance of the Times.

We regret that the Government should have been weak enough to give way even to that extent; we trust that this may be the limit of our loss, and that we may not have to meet a repetition of the tactics displayed in the "battle of the sites."

COVENANTS TO SETTLE AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

NO. 1.

There are few clauses in marriage settlements of the ordinary type which give rise to so much litigation as the covenant to settle a wife's after-acquired property. This is to a great extent accounted for by the simple fact that the clause in question attempts to provide in a few words for all the various modes and circumstances in or under which property may come to the wife, so that few, or it may be none, [of those which actually happen are in any particular case consciously present to the mind of the draftsman. It must, however, be confessed that the latter is not altogether free from blame in the matter, for, while the numerous and sometimes over-subtle distinctions which have been taken render clear in this clause especially needful, it is usually the worst drawn portion of the settlement. We propose by a short digest of the more recent decisions on the subject at the same time to guard our readers against negligence in framing the covenant in question, and to show the interpretations which have been given to some of the forms in which it is frequently expressed.

The most convenient mode of doing this seems to be to take some well-settled form and point out the effect of its component parts as they stand, and of slight variations in them. There is no substantial difference between the precedents given in Prideaux's and Davidson's collections, but the latter, and forms more nearly resembling it, are more common, and we therefore select it. Want of space restricts us to giving the precedent piecemeal in this and subsequent articles, but we recommend our readers who are not already sufficiently familiar with the general outline of the covenant in question to refer to a precedent of it.

And it is hereby agreed and declared, &c. In Prideaux's form the clause is introduced as a separate witnessing part of the deed, and the husband and wife are each made in terms to covenant with the trustees. It will be seen presently that the difference is not a material one if the subsequent part of the clause is framed in the usual way.

In many of the early cases there is a covenant by the husband only—perhaps because it was thought that the wife's covenant would be merged by the coverture; but, although she could not be sued on it at law during the

coverture, her liability would revive on her husband's death, and she would always be bound in equity. The extension of the covenant to the wife in terms or in substance is essential, in order—(1) to bind property to which the wife becomes during the coverture entitled to her separate use, and (2), in the case of his dying before her, to bind interests which vested during the coverture, but were not reduced into possession by him. Thus, in Douglas v. Congreve (1 Keen, 428), a covenant by H. that he would settle or concur in settling was held inapplicable to personality left to W. for her separate use, and see Grey v. Stuart (2 Giff. 398); and (2) in Reid v. Kenrick (3 W. R. 530) a covenant that H. would settle and join with W. in settling was held not to bind a reversionary interest in personality falling in after H.'s death; and see Young v. Smith (1 Eq. 100). The form adopted by Mr. Davidson consists of an agreement and declaration that H. and W. and all necessary parties will settle. There has been a good deal of argument as to the effect of the words, "it is agreed and declared," and in Ramsden v. Smith (2 W. R. 435, 2 Dr. 307) it was contended that they operated so as to bind separate property of W., although followed only by a covenant by H. to settle or concur with W. in settling. This contention failed, the rule laid down by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley being that such words amount only to a covenant by the party who according to the instrument containing them is to do or not to do something, and H. there was alone to do anything. But he admitted that a covenant that the property should be settled by all proper parties would come within the rule. (It was so held in Butcher v. Butcher, 14 Beav. 222, the covenant being in form by H. alone.) To this effect is the decision of Lord Justice Wood in Willoughby v. Middleton (10 W. R. 460, 2 J. & H. 344) that an agreement by all parties that property shall be dealt with in a particular way is a covenant by those parties whose concurrence is required to give effect to the provision. The usual recital of the agreement that after-acquired property should be settled, although it may be used as a key to the construction where the operative part has been doubtfully expressed, will be governed by the latter if unambiguous; and therefore in Hammond v. Hammond (3 W. R. 36, 19 Beav. 29) property settled to the separate use of W. was held not to be affected by a settlement reciting that it was agreed that all property of W., or H. in her right, should be settled, but containing a covenant by H. alone.

That if W. now is, or if during the said intended coverture she or H. in her right shall [at one and the same time and from the same source] become seized or possessed of or entitled to any real or personal property [of the value of £ and upwards] for any estate or interest whatsoever. . . . Omitting for the present the consideration of the words within brackets a glance at the above sentence will show that the title at the head of this article does not fully express the scope of the covenant we are discussing, extending as it does not only to after-acquired property but to omitted interests. There can be very little doubt that as a general rule where a settlement goes so far as to protect the future property of the wife, it was intended that all her property at the time of the marriage should be settled, but cases of course are not unfrequent where either from some slip on the part of the conveyancer, imperfect instructions, ignorance of all parties as to the existence of some of the wife's property, which, as in the possible case of a fortune being left to her by a person dying on the eve of the marriage, may be unavoidable, and other accidents which may be imagined, the settlement itself does not include all such existing interests. When, therefore, words of futurity alone are used in the covenant it would seem difficult to treat it as applicable to property belonging to the wife at the time of the marriage, but as the Court is always anxious to protect the wife and children of the marriage it will, unless the recitals indicate a contrary intention, consider such words as "vesting thereafter in H. in right of W." as applicable to the wife's existing property to which the husband became on the marriage titled, extended to a vested reversionary interest in stock on the singular ground that on the marriage she became "entitled during the coverture."

In Archer v. Kelly (1 Dr. & Sm. 300, 8 W. R. 684), the same Vice-Chancellor again expressed his disapprobation of the decisions in Graftey v. Humpage and James v. Durant, contending that the words becoming entitled clearly did not point to the husband's becoming entitled to a right which the wife already had and that to such an argument it might be retorted that the husband would not become entitled during but immediately on the commencement of the coverture. In this case the covenant was to settle property to which W. or H. in his right should become entitled during the coverture, and was held to cover a contingent remainder in real estate which vested in possession during the coverture, but not a present interest in stock. The ground for including the former was that it vested in W. during the coverture for a new interest, and on the same the decisions in Blythe v. Granville and a case of Ex parte Blake (16 Beav. 463), where property which should thereafter during the coverture descend, come to, or vest in W. or H. in her right was held to include the proceeds of land taken by a railway company to which W. was at the time of the marriage (as was long afterwards discovered) entitled in reversion, may perhaps be supported. In Spring v. Pride (12 W. R. 893) the Lord Justice Knight Bruce observed that the words "devolve" and "come" were not inaccurately applicable to reversionary interests falling into possession. So, in Brooks v. Keith (1 Dr. & Sm. 462, 9 W. R. 565) a contingent interest afterwards vesting was held bound by a similar covenant to the last, and Vice-Chancellor Stuart, in MacLurcan v. Lane (7 W. R. 135), went so far as to decide that by a covenant to settle property which should accrue to or vest in H. as estate tail in remainder, subject to preceding estates and a power of appointment, was bound on its vesting in possession; but in Churchill v. Shepherd (33 Beav. 107), the words "should vest" were properly considered inapplicable to a sum due to W. at, but not ascertained until some years after, the marriage.

It must be noticed that Vice-Chancellor Stuart, in Re Hughes' Trusts (4 Giff. 432), approved of James v. Durant and Graftey v. Humpage, and held that a reversionary interest in stock falling in after the deaths of both H. and W. was within a covenant where the words "become entitled during the coverture" only were used, but the decision cannot stand consistently with Archer v. Kelly, or with a recent case (Re Brown's Will, L. R. 7 Eq. 231, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 6) decided by the Master of the Rolls, in which the words "shall become possessed of or entitled to" were held insufficient to include an interest in some tontine debentures of and to which the wife was at the marriage possessed and entitled, but under which, by reason of the life named in them surviving other lives a considerable sum became, some years after the settlement, payable. The Master of the Rolls considered that a covenant containing only the above words could not be held to apply to the increasing value of existing property, and that the like interest would not, under the same circumstances, be bound by a covenant referring only to property which should during the coverture be given to or in any manner vest in the wife.

It is obvious that the covenant only applies to property which the husband takes in right of his wife in the sense that she would have taken it but for the marriage, and not to an interest in property expressly left on the wife's death to a surviving husband. The question, however, was raised in Ibberson v. Grote (25 Beav. 17). A covenant to settle property to which H. and W. or either in right of W. should become entitled during the coverture is also inapplicable to property left to H. and W. as joint-tenants, for W.'s reversionary interest could not fall in during the coverture, and the interest during the joint lives is in H. in his own right (Edye v. Addison, 12 W. R. 97).

The words "during their joint lives" are sometimes found in place of "during the coverture," but the latter form seems preferable, as providing for the possibility of a divorce. In the absence of such words the covenant cannot of course (unless the intention is apparent from other portions of the settlement) be restricted to property accruing during the coverture (Stevens v. Van Voorst, 17 B. 305). Where W. was entitled to some settled funds at the time of the marriage in default of the exercise of a special power of appointment, and this power was exercised in her favour after the death of H., Vice-Chancellor Wood considered that as the appointment only rendered certain what before was uncertain, her interest was bound, although not strictly coming to her during the coverture (Re Frowd's Settlement, 4 N. R. 54).

There is an old case of Howell v. Howell, reported in 4 L. J. N. S. Eq. 242, in which Pepsy, M.R., held that a covenant by both parties to settle all personal estate which should at any time after the marriage come or accrue to W. or H. in her right did not embrace interests given to W. by H.'s own will, or by the wills of other persons who died after his death; but from the circumstance that in this case there being no issue of the marriage, the representatives of H. claimed against the wife's legatees by virtue of the ultimate trust for him, the case is not of much value as an authority. We cannot, however, think that it was rightly decided, the argument which prevailed with the Court being that the covenant was intended to operate against, and not for the benefit of, the husband. So, however, it did by depriving him in favour of the children of his chance of acquiring the absolute dominion over W.'s personalty accruing during the coverture, and it is difficult to see why the ultimate interest in default of issue should not be given to him, and how, if given, it is possible to attribute less importance to that than any other of the trusts by which the property was agreed to be bound. We have expressed our disapprobation of this case, because it is cited as an authority in support of two recent questionable decisions of Vice-Chancellor Malins, in Dickinson v. Dillwyn, 17 W. R. 1122, and Carter v. Carter (not reported).

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

LORDS JUSTICES (Westminster).

Nov. 2.—Lord Justice Giffard, before opening the business of the court, made the following observations with reference to the late Lord Justice Selwyn:—

"It is impossible that this court can resume its sittings without referring to that which, on this day, is doubtless present to the minds of all in both branches of the profession—namely, the loss we have all sustained by the death of the late Lord Justice Selwyn. Called to the bar in 1840, he became a Queen's Counsel in 1856, and afterwards attained the office of Solicitor-General, and was raised to the bench, having had in those courts a practice extending over twenty-seven years, successful from the commencement of his career, and not, on the whole, inferior to that of any of his contemporaries. It was, therefore, to be expected that he would administer the law, of which he had so much experience, with ability and with decision, nor was that expectation in any respect disappointed. It was my lot, and, I may add, my happiness, to be associated with the late Lord Justice as his junior on the bench, and though that was for a few, very few months only, I may be permitted to say how certain I am that no man could have brought to the discharge of his duties a more complete and ready knowledge, a more manly judgment, a more anxious desire that in every case truth and justice and right should be done. His memory is also dear to all of us as that of a personal friend in all truth and sincerity."

Nov. 3.—Business of the Court.

On taking his seat this morning,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that it might be convenient to the Bar to know that the lunacy and bankruptcy business would for the present be taken on Saturdays.

Nov. 4.—Business of the Court.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE stated that Mr. Justice Hayes would come into court this day (Saturday) to hear any motions to be made for new trials in cases tried before him.

COMMON PLEAS.

(At Nisi Prius.—Before Mr. SMITH, J., and a Common Jury.)

Nov. 3.—Bedford v. Greaves.

Keane, Q.C., and Geary, were for the plaintiff; and Chambers, Q.C., and Day, for the defendant.

This was an action by an attorney at Amersham against the publisher of the Buckinghamshire Guardian, to recover damages for certain alleged libels which appeared in that newspaper. The libellous matter referred to the election of clerk to the Amersham Board of Guardians, for which the plaintiff and a Mr. Charsley were candidates.

Verdict for the defendant.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. MICHAEL FRANCIS DWYER, of the Irish Bar, has been appointed Registrar of Deeds in Dublin, in the room of Mr. Morgan O'Connell, who has resigned the office. Mr. Dwyer was called to the Bar in Ireland in Hilary Term, 1844.

MR. EDWARD JOHN COX DAVIES, solicitor, of Crickhowell, Brecon, has been elected Clerk to the Magistrates of the Blackwood division of that county, in the room of the late Mr. Richard Waters, deceased. Mr. Davies took out his certificate as an attorney in Hilary Term, 1846, and is a commissioner for taking affidavits.

MR. RALPH BAGSHAW, jun., has been appointed by Mr. Flint (coroner) (with the approval of the Lord Chancellor), to be Deputy Coroner for the northern division of the county of Warwick, in the room of the late Mr. Blagg, deceased. Mr. Bagshaw was certificated as an attorney in Trinity Term, 1863.

MR. EDMUND CRESSWELL PEELE, solicitor, has been elected Town Clerk of Shrewsbury, in the room of his father, Mr. Joshua John Peele, who has resigned on account of long-continued ill-health. Mr. J. J. Peel held the office of Town Clerk of Shrewsbury since the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act in 1835, and his son and successor has latterly acted for him in that capacity.

MESSRS. RICHARD J. WALKER and FREDERICK RUTTER, of Manchester, have been appointed Joint Clerks to the county magistrates of the Manchester division, in the room of the late Mr. W. S. Rutter. The only other candidate for the office was Mr. J. A. Foyster, jun, solicitor, of Salford. Mr. F. Rutter is a son of the late magistrates' clerk, but neither he nor Mr. Walker are solicitors.

MR. GEORGE MUTLOW ABELL, solicitor, of the city of Gloucester, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery in England.

MR. OSBORNE DAUNCEY, solicitor, of Wotton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Gloucester.

MR. THOMAS DAVENPORT GOODMAN, solicitor, of Chapel-en-le-Frith, Derby, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Derby.

MR. JOHN WATKINS JOHNSTON, solicitor, of Stockport, Cheshire, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Chester.

MR. THOMAS RADCLIFFE, solicitor, of Blackburn, Lancashire, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women, in and for the county of Lancaster.

MR. FRANCIS HARTLEY, solicitor, of Burnley, Lancashire, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women, in and for the county of Lancaster.

MR. CHARLES BAYLEY KING, solicitor, of Birmingham, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Warwick, the county of Worcester, and the county of Stafford.

Mr. EDWARD JOHN FRASER, solicitor, of Craven-street, Charing-cross, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Middlesex, also in and for the city of London, and the city and liberties of Westminster.

Mr. WOODFORD FROOKS, barrister-at-law, of the Western Circuit, has been elected to represent the ward of Clifton in the Town Council of Bristol for the ensuing three years. Mr. Frooks, who resides at Bristol, was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1844.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

SOLICITORS' BOOK-KEEPING.

Sir,—A solicitor at Braintree has been sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment for appropriating to his own use the moneys of his clients. It is almost unnecessary to point out to solicitors the danger of mingling clients' moneys with their own. It cannot be doubted that a solicitor appropriating to his own use money confided to him by his clients is guilty of a greater crime than picking a pocket or robbing a till; for he adds breach of trust to theft, and uses the confidence of his employer for the purpose of robbing him. It is to be feared that the offence of thus misappropriating the property they hold in trust is more frequent than the public are aware. On this point we ask your sanction to say a few words, and to state a little of our experience.

Twenty years ago our Mr. Kain was urged, by some members of the profession, to devise a system of solicitors' book-keeping which could be easily learnt, and by which a practitioner could at any moment know the exact amount of money he had in his hands belonging to his clients, and at the same time test its accuracy by ascertaining his own profits and also the exact amount due to him for capital, cash in hand and at the bank, and also the amount of book debts owing to him. Our Mr. Kain devised such a plan accordingly, and our records show that the plan has been adopted in 1,821 solicitors' offices, in none of which could the appropriation of clients' moneys occur unless done wilfully.

Of course it would be said that in the case referred to the misappropriation was wilful, and therefore that no system of book-keeping would avail, but it may also be surmised that the peccant solicitor alluded to began unconsciously, and with smaller amounts than that (some £300) for which he was ultimately convicted. The object of good book-keeping is more to prevent than to cure. If a solicitor has constantly before his eyes the results above enumerated, he can scarcely go wrong unless he belies all his antecedents.

Solicitors are proverbially bad accountants. An attempt was made some few years ago to embue the rising profession with a better knowledge of book-keeping, by requiring all articulated clerks in their intermediate examination to show some proficiency in so useful an art. It is within our knowledge that at first much pains were taken to acquire the necessary information, but after a time for some inscrutable reasons, the rules were altered and the word "mercantile" was prefixed to the word "book-keeping," thus ostensibly putting a veto upon any studies by which, in this respect, the peculiar requirements of a solicitor's office might be attained. At the same time the questions themselves became of so elementary a character that it is doubted whether any attention is now paid to the subject till the moment for examination arrives. Indeed, anecdotes are rife of the questions themselves being treated with great irreverence.

During our twenty years' practice as law accountants we have met with very painful cases, where the consequences of bad book-keeping fell with disastrous effect on widows and children, cases where the receipts and payments, although duly entered in the cash book, were never cast up and balanced, and but fitfully posted to the client's accounts in the ledger; therefore no balance could ever be struck. In such cases we have mostly found sums, more or less large, were due to the clients, while, on the other hand, on our making out the bills of costs and ascertaining the book debts due to the estate, we have found these also more or less large in amount, but of comparatively small value, owing mainly to the delay in sending in and the consequent bar by statute of the bills of costs. We have found generally that small capitalists in provincial towns place their savings in the hands of solicitors to an extent which is almost incredible. We have known of towns where wide spread distress has been caused by the death or failure of solicitors where such confidence has been placed. We have also found, as might have been expected, that cases of wilful fraud are rare. In numerous cases we have detected fraud by clerks, carried on systematically for years, the careless system of book-keeping rendering detection by a principal almost impossible. Indeed, we could fill many of your columns with anecdotes were we to relate some of the cases where much loss and much distress, public and private, has arisen from neglect in making out and sending in the bills of costs, and from bad book-keeping.

INFERENCE OF FRAUD.

Sir,—If I am not much mistaken, I have read somewhere in the volume of the Solicitors' Journal just completed a statement that the judges, having power reserved to them to draw inferences of fact as a jury, will not infer fraud where a special case does not give fraud as a fact; and I think that that position three cases were cited.

I have looked carefully through the index just published, as also through the current Weekly Reporter digest, but in vain.

If the volume contains such a statement, I should be obliged by a reference to the page. J. H. B.

[We can call to mind no statement such as that referred to by J. H. B., nor can we imagine such a rule as having been laid down. All courts are reluctant to infer fraud, but a court will infer fraud in cases where any other inference would be an absurdity.—Ed. S. J.]

OBITUARY.

MR. GEORGE PACKWOOD.

The death of Mr. George Packwood, solicitor, of Cold-harbour-lane, Camberwell, and of Nicholas-lane, Lombard-street, City, took place on the 29th October, at the age of forty-seven years. Mr. Packwood was certificated as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1864.

MR. FRANCIS HOOLE.

This gentleman, who was a solicitor of Sheffield, died at Scarborough on the 2nd November, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Mr. Francis Hoole, who was a member of the Sheffield firm of Hoole & Tattershall, took out his certificate as an attorney and notary in Hilary Term, 1826. He was a member of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and also of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

MEETING IN YORK.

The members of this association met at York, on Tuesday, on the 19th ult., being the guests of the Yorkshire Law Society, and commenced the transaction of business in the Poor Law Guardians' Board Room, in Museum-street, which had been kindly lent for the purpose. The following solicitors were present:—Arthur Barnes (Lichfield), J. W. Hamilton Richardson (Leeds), Henry Anderson (York), J. F. Spurr (Scarbro'), W. Brignall, jun. (Durham), George Hodgson (Driffield), W. Watson (Hedon), H. Gaskell Taylor (St. Helen's), Thomas Thompson (Hull), Meek Dyson (Boston Spa), S. Alcock, jun. (Sunderland), Thomas Hawdon (Selby), Henry Bell (Birkenhead), L. M. Cockcroft (Newcastle), J. A. Bush (Newcastle), J. B. Falconer (Newcastle), John Atkinson (Liverpool), J. P. Wood (York), R. R. Blyth (York), Thomas Avison (Liverpool), J. A. Bromet (Tadcaster), O. R. Garwood (York), E. Turner Payne (Bath), Edward Banner (Liverpool), Hugh Dunn (Darlington), T. M. Weddall (Selby), Joseph Munby (York), R. R. Dees (Newcastle), A. H. Russell (York), T. S. Noble (York), Richard Perkins (York), G. J. John son (Birmingham), R. A. Payne (Liverpool), T. L. Bickers (Tadcaster), R. J. Parker (Selby), Edward Lawrance (London), Philip Rickman (London), J. J. P. Moody (Scarbro'), W. Walker (York), Henry Brearey (York), George Brown (York), Robert Dale (York), J. P. Guy (York), Jas. Grayston, jun. (York), John Holtby (York), John Leak (Hull), J. W. Mann (York), T. G. Mann (York), Arthur Thompson (York), H. J. Ware (York), W. P. Husband (York), Martin Richardson (Bridlington), G. C. Roberts (Hull), Robert Holtby (York), W. H. Cobb (York), Henry Wood (York), F. W. Calvert (Scarbro'), C. F. Tagart (London), B. Dixon (Wakefield), Charles Naylor (Leeds), William Shaen (London), John Case (Maidstone), Robert Danby (Stamford Bridge), John Yates (Liverpool), J. S. Torr (London), John Watson (Pickering), E. C. Petgrave (Bath), Charles Bischoff (London), John Chambers (Sheffield), G. A. Nesfield (Scarbro'), William Radcliffe (Liverpool), Wm. Saville Wood (Pontefract), William Daggett (Newcastle-on-Tyne), J. M. Clabon (London), W. B. Richardson (Scarbro') J. J. Leeman (York), John Ansdell (St. Helen's), Francis D. Lowndes (Liverpool), F. S. Hull (Liverpool), C. T. Saunders (Birmingham), Wm. Crossman (London), James Street (Manchester), J. Lingard Vaughan (Stockport), W. H. Guest (Manchester), Percy Woolley (Manchester).

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. Edward Lawrance).—My first duty, and it is a very pleasing one, is to congratulate you upon this your 22nd anniversary meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association. It is a substantial proof of its inherent vitality. I speak not of its financial position, with which at present we have nothing to do; yet although we do not profess to be a wealthy body I believe we have sufficient to pay our debts.

My first reference is to the attempted legislation of the past year. Of those bills which more especially affected us, the first was Mr. Norwood's County Court Proceedings Bill, which contained many useful provisions which we shall have the opportunity of discussing on some subsequent occasion. Another bill re-introduced by Mr. Norwood was Mr. Shaw Lefevre's Married Woman's Property Bill, 1868. That bill, upon which you remember there was a very extended discussion, will, if again introduced, require careful consideration on the part of our branch of the profession. If the bill be carried in its present form it will create a great revolution in reference to husband and wife as regards their property. It probably might lead the profession to advise their clients of every degree to do what they are in the habit of doing for their more aristocratic clients—viz., to make a pre-nuptial agreement or settlement as to after-acquired property, even although at the time of making such settlement no such acquisition of fortune was contemplated. Unless some such step be taken I apprehend that the acquisition of wealth will prove a misfortune, and be the means of interminable jealousy, for it might place the husband in the position of being liable for his wife's debts without his having any control over her property.

Another bill requiring grave consideration is Mr. Locke King's Real Estates Intestacy Bill. If that bill should have a tendency, as I think is contemplated, to effect the sub-division of property into minute portions, I think it would be deprecated by every legal body in the kingdom. This meeting is not intended to discuss politics, nor is this a political question; but if there be one thing more than another which would tend to destroy the legitimate influence and position of the great landed proprietary, it would be the minute sub-division of land. But the apprehended mischief of the bill may be to a considerable extent met by our advising our clients, as a salutary measure, always to make their wills. I am quite sure that no more disinterested advice can be given by a solicitor, and especially should a client be advised to discharge that duty to himself and his family before age or sickness comes upon him, and when he ought to be thinking of other and better things. I am quite sure that if it were a fixed rule in the profession it would cease to be considered obtrusive if at the period of marriage or other period when we come into contact with our clients we tendered this advice to them. The provisions of this bill, if again introduced, will, of course, in like manner receive the careful consideration of the profession, not only with reference to its principle, but to its minute details. And I may say of these and other bills of which the profession must necessarily have the ultimate working that it is our duty to suggest such amendments as seem to us to be useful. The two great societies, the Incorporated Law Society and the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, which two societies fully and fairly represent the attorneys and solicitors of the united kingdom, are now, so to speak, recognised bodies in the State; any suggestions made by those societies receive the most serious attention from both Houses of Parliament, for it is felt that it is in the general interests of the public to recognise in legislation the practical views of practical men. And, although I am afraid the world will not give us credit for disinterestedness, I am quite sure that there are no more zealous and earnest law reformers than the lawyers.

I must now mention another and very important piece of attempted legislation which I would very much rather had been brought before you by my excellent friend and every man's friend, Mr. Edwin Field, who I am sorry to say is prevented by illness from being with us. I allude to the ministerial bill for the proposed purchase of a new site for the Courts of Justice other than that which has been already purchased and paid for, and is now lying unoccupied at an enormous loss of interest upon the purchase-money. If Mr. Field had been here, I should certainly have been prepared to have endorsed all his language, however earnest and emphatic. I consider that the question of the rival sites is one not particularly affecting us, but largely affecting the public interests. The purchase of the present site was no hasty or ill-considered measure—every fact connected with the purchase had been fairly and fully considered. At first it was considered that a grand palatial building might be erected on the Thames Embankment, and the superiority of that site was contended for by Sir Charles Trevelyan upon purely æsthetic grounds, which are now unhesitatingly abandoned; then at the last moment the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to purchase other land of like dimensions with the Carey-street site, to build the Courts of Justice, where they would be scarcely visible from the river and not at all from the leading thoroughfare. I really could not have supposed that the demon of party could have been invoked for such a purpose. But the Premier, at the suggestion, doubtless, of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was driven to move for a committee to consider the rival sites, and that committee, although so to speak of his own nomination, reported in favour of the Carey-street site. And upon that committee I think we are bound to acknowledge the services of Mr. Gabriel Goldney, the member for Chippenham, who was for many years a member of our branch of the profession. Although the project of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been reported against, we must not suppose that our battle has been won; and I strongly urge you to use your legitimate influence with your county and borough members (and I am quite sure that no other means would be resorted to by you, although such a charge has been made against us by those who are not remarkable either for geniality of manner or courtesy of tone) to induce them to give the question a fair consideration, quite apart from politics, for it is not and ought never to have been made a party question. I am quite satisfied that, apart from the very serious delay which would be the inevitable result of selecting a new site, the site first selected is the best. And another strong argument in favour of the Carey-street site which did not exist at the time of its purchase is the recent completion of the Holborn Viaduct, by which the access from the City to Carey-street will be greatly facilitated.

I now propose shortly to deal with those bills which have become law. The first in order, although not a very important one as affecting the London practitioners, is Mr. Hatfield's Special Bails Bill, which facilitates the taking of special bail in the country. It was at one time proposed to extend the operation of that bill to London, but upon an intimation by Mr. Hatfield that any amendment might have the effect of defeating or postponing the measure, the proposed amendments were withdrawn. It is due also to Mr. Hatfield to recall to some of our younger members that he was formerly a member of our branch of the profession, and has always been ready to assist us in any practical measures.

Another Act to which I will call your attention is the Act for the further amendment of the Law of Evidence. I believe the bill was introduced by the Hon. George Denman. I certainly am prepared to echo the words of the preamble, and to state that the discovery of truth has indeed been signally promoted by the removal of restrictions, and although I shared in by-gone years the prevailing delusion that a broad distinction should be drawn between the competency and credibility of witnesses, and that parties to a suit should not be examined, I am now prepared fully to admit that it was absurd in contentious matters to exclude the evidence of those who knew most about them. The Act enables parties in suits for breach of promise of marriage to be witnesses, and also in suits for adultery for parties, and their husbands and wives, to be witnesses. It must be a great satisfaction to parties to a suit to know that whatever may be the result, they have at least had the opportunity of telling their own story in their own way.

Another useful Act which received the Royal assent was an Act to amend the County Courts Jurisdiction Act, 1868, and to give jurisdiction in certain maritime cases, extending that jurisdiction over ships and goods, and enabling parties, if they agreed to have matters of higher amount dealt with than those prescribed by the county court, and also enabling the judge of the county court to be assisted, at the request of either party, as he now is in London, by two competent mercantile assessors. My professional friends at Liverpool are also doubtless aware that an assessor of the Court of Passage has, by the 6th section of that Act, power to make general rules and orders for regulating the practice and procedure of our Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction Court.

There is also another very important Act which remedies a long-existing grievance, and of which I have no doubt the public will hereafter feel the benefit. I allude to the Act to abolish the distinction as to priority of payment which now exists between the specialty and simple contract debts of deceased persons, and which will come into operation as to the estate of every person who shall die on or after the 1st January next. Of course I do not know whether the Act will meet with general approval, but it seems to me to be based upon substantial justice. You are doubtless aware that for many years past no such distinction has existed in bankruptcy, and that all creditors, whether by specialty or simple contract, rank rateably in the distribution of the bankrupt's estate. You must frequently have seen, in administering the estates of deceased debtors, specialty claims tendered—probably bonds given by the deceased upon the marriage of his daughter, or for the advancement of his son, for which there has been no substantial pecuniary consideration; and those claims not only rank in priority against the estate of the deceased, but rank to the exclusion of all simple contract creditors, although those debts may have been contracted with full consideration, such as goods supplied to the deceased in the way of his trade. So that the administration of the deceased's estate is rather a process of absorption for the benefit of family creditors than of distribution. An attempt was unsuccessfully made a few years since to render the estate of the deceased trader liable to the bankrupt laws. The present Act practically attains that end, and although it may press hardly upon those who would claim the benefit of specialty debts bearing date before the Act comes into operation, I think on the whole it is a highly beneficial measure.

I have but a few observations to make upon an Act which, though dealing with large sums of money, does not materially affect us or our clients. It is the Act for amending the law relating to the salaries, expenses, and funds of courts of law in England, and is an Act rather for the transfer of certain stocks and funds of the suitors of the Court of Chancery to the Consolidated Fund. Of course the Consolidated Fund is as good a debtor as the Court of Chancery. The suitors, therefore, need be under no apprehension as to ultimate payment, and I am willing to assume that the convenience of the State has been promoted by the passing of the Act. There is, however, one fund transferred by this Act to which, incidentally, I wish to call your attention—namely, the sum of a million and a quarter, in round figures, standing to the credit of the Bankruptcy Fund account. Now, as both here and out of doors we have always associated bankrupts and bankrupts' estates with the entire absence of assets, you will immediately be curious to know how this large amount has been accumulated. In truth it represents unclaimed dividends, balances of a vast number of estates too small to be susceptible of division, and interest upon a portion of the fund, and the great part will probably never be claimed. But the Chief Registrar's Fund, forming a portion of the before-mentioned amount, was the fund whereto assignees and creditors resorted for payment of the costs incurred by them by direction of the Court in the prosecution of fraudulent bankrupts. This fund will certainly no longer be available for that purpose. You will find that the only fund out of which those costs will in future be paid will be what we understand by the county allowance. Perhaps, however, my future observations upon this will come more properly when I am calling your attention to the provisions of the new Bankruptcy Act.

There are three other Acts to which I must call your attention—namely, an Act to consolidate and amend the law of bankruptcy; an Act for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, and for the punishment of fraudulent debtors, and for other purposes; and an Act to provide for the winding-up of the business of the late Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors and repealing certain existing statutes. The first of these Acts is the most comprehensive. As to that Act, I had hoped that we should have been favoured with some paper on bankruptcy from some one of our members, and that a general discussion would have been taken upon it. But, in the absence of such a paper, I think it my duty, with your permission, and having some practical knowledge upon the subject, to make some observations upon this most important Act. I think it very much to be regretted that the bill which was drawn last year, and which was settled clause by clause by the most skillful Parliamentary draftsman of modern days; a man of large experience and the highest order of talent, and who made plain English tell its own story in the simplest possible manner—I allude to Mr. Reilly—that that bill, which had been so carefully drawn which had been submitted to all the provincial law societies and chambers of commerce, and obtained their approbation, many of their suggestions having been adopted, should have been ignored, and a fresh bill drawn by a gentleman undoubtedly of great talent, but who absolutely knew nothing of bankruptcy until he was instructed to draw this bill. Hence the very imperfect state in which that bill was first presented to the public, and hence the very imperfect state, notwithstanding many alterations, in which it still remains. I make these observations in no captious spirit, but really in the tone of the deepest regret, as I feel that the general interests of the trading community, which were assumed to be, and which ought to be, the first consideration, have been in many important particulars seriously neglected. Neither the Incorporated Law Society nor this society are to blame for the present defects in the bill. I think I may unhesitatingly say, without fear of contradiction, that if our several suggestions had been attended to the bill would have presented a very different and much more useful aspect. Immediately upon the bill being brought in our respective societies formed committees for the purpose of considering the several provisions, and suggestions were forwarded to the head quarters. As I have before stated, it is a proof of the weight and influence of our respective societies that many of our suggestions were adopted. And here I must bear testimony to the very great assistance we have received from our well-known friend and professional brother Mr. George Gregory, the member for East Sussex, who was always accessible and rendered us the most substantial aid.

The first section to which I will call your attention is the 6th, which provides that the petitioning creditor's debt must be in respect of a liquidated sum due at law or in equity. You are, of course, aware that the law as it now stands, and as it has stood since the 5th Geo. 2, enables a client to petition in respect of a debt not due, provided the debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy; in other words, that the committal of an act of bankruptcy matures every debt. But here divers acts of bankruptcy are enumerated, and yet creditors cannot take any advantage of any one of them if the debt is not due. Now the practical result will be this, and I press this very strongly upon your attention, because it will, I think, be necessary in the interest of trade to ask the Legislature to apply a remedy at the earliest possible moment. I will put a simple illustration. I will suppose that a man wishing to start in business borrows from a relative £2,000, giving him as security a promissory note payable on demand. Upon the strength of that advance, which he would communicate to the wholesale houses with whom he proposes to open accounts, he would probably be able to purchase goods in the Manchester market to the amount of £10,000 or £15,000 upon the usual terms of credit—say three months. With those goods he starts in business. If at the end of six weeks or two months his prospects are not bright, the relative may, acting upon the gentle intimation so frequently conveyed to favoured creditors, obtain judgment upon his promissory note at the expiration of twelve days, and sell by public auction or private contract, and may pay himself; and the debtor may announce to his other creditors, whose debts are not due, that he intends to make no provision for them, but that he intends to emigrate with the proceeds, leaving the chance of payment to some future day. The creditors will probably stand aghast at this announcement, but they are absolutely without remedy. They cannot adjudicate him bankrupt in respect of the seizure under the execution, or of any one of the acts of bankruptcy named in the statute, nor can they stop him if he depart from the country. Now, this is such a monstrous reversal of the first policy of the bankrupt law that it is really difficult to understand why the alteration was made. I know that the attention of the Legislature was called to the objection at the earliest possible moment, and strong reasons urged for allowing the law to remain as it stands at present; and I am told that in the committee on the bill in the House of Lords there was a division of five against five as to the retention of the clause in its present shape, the casting vote being, however, in favour of the alteration; and I assume that this was done upon the principle that non-traders ought not to be made liable to the bankrupt laws in respect of debts not due. The answer to this objection is, I think, that the application of the clause making debtors liable in respect of debts not due might have been restricted to traders.

I may also here notice that there is no clause requiring the sheriff to sell by public auction.

The Act proposes to give creditors greater powers in the management of their own affairs by introducing what is assumed to be the Scotch system. Now, I conceive that creditors are the fittest persons to manage their own affairs, but not the fittest persons to undertake the administration of estates in which they are interested; I was an advocate for the retention of official assignees under certain modifications. I consider the proposed mode of appointing trustees exceedingly cumbersome, and that it will work inconveniently in practice. There is the greatest possible difficulty in inducing creditors to attend meetings or take personal part in the discussion as to the fitness of proposed assignees. There is great difficulty in getting them to prove their debts or even to receive their dividends. The consequence therefore probably will be, that the trustee will be appointed by canvass out of doors, and that the man who is most energetic in the canvass—not always the fittest man—will succeed in obtaining the appointment. Again, the resolution declaring what security is to be given will be found to work very inconveniently, as the amount of the security ought to depend upon the amount of the assets, and at that early period it is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to put a value upon them. But this security is to be given before the trustee enters on the duties of his office. Again, the creditors having first qualified themselves to vote by proving their debts, are to appoint other fit persons, not exceeding five in number, to act as a committee of inspection. Now, does any reasonable man suppose that any number of creditors will take upon themselves the duty of supervising the acts of the trustees, taking upon themselves that trouble without payment; and what advantage would the creditors gain by appointing a trustee if they were themselves to do the work of supervision? And is it to be supposed that an independent trustee, of good position, such a man as one would like to see administering bankrupts' estates, would submit to such a supervision?

It seems to me a machinery not at all adapted to the very large majority of estates. I do not propose to trouble you with the details of the mode in which the justice is required to discharge his duty, but I invite your special attention, because it does affect our branch of the profession, to the 29th section, which provides that where the trustee is himself a solicitor he may contract to be paid a certain sum by way of per centage, or otherwise, as remuneration for his services as trustee, including all professional services. Now you will confer a great obligation, not only upon the London solicitors, but upon your provincial brethren, if you will not only by discussion to-day, but in your several societies, consider whether it is expedient, as a rule, that solicitors should propose to act as trustees in the administration of insolvent estates. Whether they would be in the majority of cases appointed by the creditors of course I am not prepared to say. I think they would. Still the question remains, whether the solicitors should take upon themselves the discharge of those duties. I speak not of the liability necessarily incident to the office of trustee, because if a trustee is prepared to do his duty he need not fear any consequences, but I am looking at it in a professional and remunerative point of view. Of course men who have attained my period of life have old fashioned prejudices. I do not like to be paid by a per centage and placed on a level with debt collectors. It seems to be against the etiquette of the profession. But we are still bound to look at it as a matter of fact. Do we contemplate allowing accountants entirely to supersede us in the administration of insolvencies. Perhaps we ought not to be disturbed by qualms of conscience as to professional status; but we must consider whether the probable remuneration would compensate us for the trouble. I admit there would be very considerable difficulty in fixing the amount of remuneration. Of course it is impossible to foresee what estates will realise, and assuming a per centage to be agreed upon the assumed amount of assets, it would be necessary to have a saving clause that this should not cover the costs of actions at law to be brought by, and still less of actions to be brought against, trustees. Of course the accountants as a body would be opposed to solicitors competing with them, and this might place solicitors in the very invidious position of being underbid or underbidding in settling the terms of remuneration. You will perceive that by the terms of the section no solicitor or other agent is to be employed by the trustees without the consent of the committee of inspection, so that if a trustee does appoint a solicitor without such consent he would have to pay him out of his own remuneration. This would of course make the solicitor the servant of the trustee. But if the solicitor be appointed with the consent of the committee, then I apprehend he would be entitled to be paid out of the general estate. Still the main question remains, whether we shall in any case consent to act as trustees, or steadfastly refuse under any circumstances to take upon ourselves that office. I again ask you to give the matter your early consideration, and to report the result of your deliberations to the two parent societies in London. In this and all other matters it is desirable that the legal profession should act with as much uniformity and consistency as possible. It may be that the old practice may still be found the most convenient to adhere to—namely, that the creditors should appoint a solicitor who would be adopted by the trustee, and that his costs should, as heretofore, be paid out of the bankrupt's estate. Otherwise, if no such resolution to appoint a solicitor be passed, and the trustee requires, as he necessarily would, the assistance of a solicitor in the administration of the estate, the trustee would of course be interested in making the closest possible bargain with the solicitor, seeing that his bill of costs would come out of the trustee's remuneration.

I cannot avoid making a few observations upon the difficulties imposed upon the bankrupt in the way of obtaining his order of discharge and the general status of an undischarged bankrupt. I always have thought, and still think, that if a man has given up all his estate he is entitled to his release. If he has contracted his debts fraudulently or inconsistently with fair dealing, punish him; but if he has surrendered all he has, give him at least the opportunity of retrieving his position and send him back into the world again with a chance of getting a living in the future, and of becoming a wiser and a better man; but do not pass upon him sentence of perpetual mercantile excommunication. It may, indeed, be said that a bankrupt is entitled to his order of discharge if his estate shows ten shillings in the pound, but experience has shown that men who have assets which upon realization by forced sale would produce ten shillings in the pound are never likely to suspend payment until those assets are reduced to a much smaller amount. The estate which produced ten shillings in the pound under bankruptcy would probably represent assets which, if realised in the usual course of trade, would be worth fifteen shillings in the pound. Again, is it not an inducement for a man to buy largely upon the eve of his bankruptcy for the purpose of approaching more nearly to the required amount of ten shillings? But assuming that his estate only realises five shillings in the pound, and that his debts are large, how can he so long as he is without his order of discharge get into business, earn and accumulate the necessary profits to make up the deficiency? Will the wholesale houses trust a man under those circumstances? I think not; and he thus, therefore, will not be likely to obtain, or they to receive, the statutable amount. Then a bankrupt is to have, if his estate at the close of the bankruptcy (and this is a very uncertain term) has not produced ten shillings in the pound, a quasi letter of licence for three years to enable him to make up the deficiency, and if at the end of three years he has not made up that amount, then the creditors whose hands are stayed during the three years are restored to their rights as creditors, not in respect of the difference between the five shillings he may have paid and the ten shillings he is required to pay, but for the remainder fifteen shillings in the pound, thereby, of course, trebling the amount of his liability. But the creditors are not to take proceedings against the bankrupt upon the judgment so to be obtained, without leave of the Court, who will inquire into the debtor's means and ascertain the amount of new debts contracted. Now, what a scene of fraud this will open. Does any reasonable being suppose that even if the bankrupt is possessed apparently of considerable assets representing after-acquired property, the old creditors will participate in it to the extent of a single shilling? Every species of device will be resorted to for the purpose of interposing between the old creditors and their rights. I strongly deprecate legislation which has a tendency to engender fraud. No doubt it is true that the Court may, with the assent of the creditors, by special resolution grant a bankrupt his order of discharge without payment of ten shillings in the pound, if in their, the creditors' opinion, his failure to pay the required ten shillings has arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible. Now, it will be exceedingly difficult to interpret these words; but, assuming the bankrupt to have paid the required ten shillings, or to have been absolved from that payment by the special resolution of the creditors, what is the value of the order of discharge when obtained, if it is not to be available if the debtor's liability has been incurred by means of any fraud or breach of trust (not specified), or from any debt or liability forborne of which he had obtained by means of any fraud? The words are so wide, and the language so vague, that it seems to me that every order of discharge may be questioned at any period of a man's life, and that a conveyancing counsel advising upon an abstract of title to property in which the bankrupt was interested would, in addition to the usual inquiry whether he had obtained his order of discharge, be bound to inquire into the circumstances under which every debt was contracted.

The second of the acts to which I have referred—that imposing penalties upon fraudulent debtors—is open to the objection that the expenses of a prosecution are to be allowed, paid, and borne as expenses of prosecution for felony are now allowed, paid, and borne. This, of course, means that the prosecutors are to be entitled only to what we understand by the county allowance. Now any man who has ever instituted a prosecution, whether under bankruptcy or otherwise, knows that the county allowance, however inexpensively the prosecution has been conducted, does not cover a tithe of the expenses. I may instance one recently in which my firm was engaged, in which a prosecution was directed by the Master of the Rolls, and a prosecution followed. The county allowance was about £27, the actual expense incurred by the prosecution, and allowed after strict taxation by the strictest taxing master of the Court of Chancery, amounted to £600. As the law stood under the Act of 1849 the costs of the prosecution were paid out of the bankrupt's estates. Subsequently, I think by the Act of 1861, the Chief Registrar's Fund was chargeable with those costs, because it was considered unfair in the interests of the general public, for whose protection the bankrupt was prosecuted, that the estate of the particular bankrupt should be chargeable with the expense. But as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has now appropriated the whole of the Chief Registrar's Fund, and as it would be useless to apply to the Treasury for payment of extra costs, and in the absence of any provision to that effect of course no trustee under a bankrupt's estate would be justified in applying any part of that estate in payment of those costs, it really would come to this, that prosecutions having been deemed expedient, and the bankrupt having been convicted, the creditors would be obliged individually to contribute towards payment of the costs. It is not very likely, in addition to the loss sustained by the failure or fraud of the bankrupt, that the creditors would put their hands into their pockets to make up the required amount. The result, therefore, will inevitably be this, that there will be more offences and fewer prosecutions.

I find I have omitted to call your attention to the 70th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which enables every attorney and solicitor of the superior courts to practice as a solicitor in the Court of Bankruptcy and in matters before the Chief Judge. This you will probably remember is simply re-enacting the like section in the Acts of 1849 and 1861, but it is important as extending the privilege to practising before the Chief Judge. The reasonable interpretation of the clause therefore is, that a solicitor may lead a cause before the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy in matters directed to be heard by him before a special jury of London merchants. And in the interests of that branch of the profession which I am now addressing I certainly shall take the opportunity of conducting the first special jury case which I may have to try before the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

It only remains for me to make a few observations upon the arrangement and composition clauses. I think it very much to be regretted that the Attorney-General so stoutly and strenuously refused to incorporate into this Act the Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 1868, known as Mr. Moffat's Act, and especially having reference to arrangement by deed, and which remedied all the existing evils in the Act of 1861 in that particular. The main benefits conferred by that Act were the exclusion of the secured debts of creditors in the computation of debts, and also the requiring creditors to verify their debts. The provisions for the registration of deeds of arrangement were, I think, as perfect as could be, and I think the facilities which enabled creditors to administer the estates of debtors in their own way, affording also to honest debtors the means of carrying through a composition—always more beneficial to creditors than the administration of an estate under an assignment—were greater than under any previous system. And yet, for this comparatively perfect system, one is introduced full of doubt and difficulty.

In order to enable the debtor to carry out a liquidation by arrangement, he must summon a general meeting of his creditors, and that meeting, by special resolution, is to define the nature of the arrangement which is to be confirmed at a subsequent meeting. But the Act requires that all the provisions relating to a first meeting of creditors in bankruptcy are to apply to the first meeting for liquidation. Now this involves the extreme inconvenience of creditors being required to prove their debts before they can pass their resolution. Practically, we all know that at the first meeting of creditors a general statement is laid before them. The vast proportion of those who attend are not creditors capable of proving their debts, but consist of solicitors, solicitors' clerks, or agents, who are required to attend simply for the purpose of obtaining information, and when the composition is ventilated and the assent of the creditors virtually, but not actually, obtained, then we proceed to carry out the arrangement. But now in order to enable us to pass the resolution, creditors who have proved can alone be allowed to vote upon it. At this early stage you do not actually know who the creditors are, who are the bill holders, or what may be the rights and equities of creditors as between themselves. But all these particulars must be ascertained, the amount of the debt actually defined, and the creditor prove his debt before he can vote. This, therefore, involves the practical impossibility of carrying any substantial resolution at the first meeting, and the easy and frequently conclusive mode in which the first meeting is now ordinarily held and the resolution passed will be absolutely impossible under the new system. It seems to me also that the importation of the registrar into the matter is quite unnecessary, and that instead of giving creditors additional facilities for dealing with their debts, additional difficulties are imposed by these sections. In fact these clauses more than ever justify my observation that the statute has been prepared by unskilled hands, and is certainly not calculated in way particular to improve the remedies of creditors against their debtors. We shall, however, see what the proposed rules and orders do to remedy the existing defects, for as was truly said, so much is required to be prescribed by those rules and orders that the Act is an Act to enable the Lord Chancellor and the Chief Judge to make an Act for the administration of debtors' estates. And bad as the Act may be, it is our duty to make the best of it.

Another bill which was introduced last year, at the close of the session, and which will probably receive early attention, is the bill to amend the existing law of remuneration with regard to attorneys and solicitors. This bill was brought in by Mr. Rathbone, the member for Liverpool, Mr. Morley, the member for Bristol, and our friend Mr. Gregory. It is a very important question for further consideration why we should not be allowed to make a bargain with our clients. The bill was a very short one, but was calculated to work very great change in the relation between solicitor and client as regards the bill of costs. I am not at present prepared to accept the full scope of the bill, but it does seem to me unreasonable that while other trades and professions are enabled to make contracts for the work to be done, attorneys should be unable to do so. Of course, if the bargain were oppressive on the client, the Court has the opportunity of setting it aside. It seems to me to be a bill to enable us to dispense with the formality of sending in a bill of costs, the loss of time incident to the preparation of it, and the annoyance of its being subsequently submitted to taxation. I believe that many of ourselves and our predecessors would have been richer men if relieved from the burthen of making out our bills of costs, and enabled to receive a sum certain in payment; and I believe myself that the client would be, as a rule, a considerable gainer by the contract, as, wherever the amount of the bill of costs has been guessed at after the business has been done, and before the bill had been made out, you almost invariably find that if the bill be afterwards made out—either at the request of a client or for one's own personal satisfaction—the amount so agreed to be accepted is very considerably less than that to which the solicitor is actually entitled. However, this is one of those matters which must be carefully considered by us in our several societies, not only with reference to its principle, but its details.

You have probably all of you read the first report of the Judicature Commission, a very able and comprehensive document. Immediately the commission was formed, each of the law societies took the matter up, and formed a joint committee for the purpose of making recommendations and suggestions. Papers were contributed by the different members of the two societies, the recommendations were carefully considered, and certain points being resolved upon, after anxious deliberation, they were forwarded to the secretary of the commission, and it is a singular fact that many of the suggestions have been adopted by the Judicature Committee almost in the language in which they were suggested. We were told before they were tendered to the commission that our recommendations would be attended to with the greatest respect. Many of the subjects, such as the concentration of the business of the courts; the carrying out of what seemed to be one of the first principles, that a man should obtain full justice in one court without being sent to another tribunal to complete his remedy, a course painful to the solicitor and frequently ruinous to the client; the suggested alteration of the jury system; and the alteration of the circuits, were, I think, recommended by us. I am glad to find that a further commission has been issued, including some additional names of great weight, and with an enlarged scope of subjects of inquiry. I sincerely hope at no distant period the suggestions made by the first report will become the subject of legislation, and that every future step will tend more and more to the simplification of the administration of the laws.

Before I conclude, I cannot avoid congratulating you upon the prospects of our profession, not in a pecuniary sense, because every step in modern legislation has been to diminish our profits, but in what we call its status. The present social position of our branch of the profession as contrasted with what it was when I entered it upwards of forty years since, would have transcended the wildest imaginings of the most romantic articulated clerk of those days. We then approached the bench with "bated breath and whispering humbleness," we are now received both in public and in private upon that equal footing to which we are entitled as educated men and as gentlemen, although the line of demarcation between the two branches of the profession still exists, improperly as many think, usefully as I think, in the general interests of the public and of the profession.

I have no doubt there are many other matters to which I as chairman of this meeting ought to have called your attention, but I have occupied your time at so great a length that I am positively ashamed of myself. It only remains for me to thank you for the kindness which you have extended to me with such exemplary patience.

After the Chairman's address, it was resolved unanimously that the next annual meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association should be held at Bristol.

Mr. SHAEN, of London, then made some observations on the topics adverted to in the Chairman's address. He spoke favourably of the Married Women's Property Bill, stating that he was a member of the committee that drew it up in the first instance, and placed it in the hands of Mr. Shaw Lefevre. He then proceeded to point out how improvements might be made in its operation, and noticed the working of the principle in the state of New York. The bill, however, scarcely came up to his ideal of the state of the law with regard to husband and wife. He would rather have it regarded as a partnership than as two individuals with exclusive rights. His belief was that, judging from the experience of other nations, very great good would result from the passing of the bill. He next alluded to Mr. Locke King's Real Property Intestacy Bill, but did not anticipate it would have a very large action, as most of the persons in this country possessed of land made their wills. Mr. Shaen next spoke of the proposed sites for the courts of law, and pointed out the influence of the association on members of Parliament, remarking that beyond doubt the Carey-street site was an admirable one. The question of the payment of prosecutions was of vital importance, and he proceeded to point out the injurious effects of the scheme as it at present stood. The county allowance differed enormously in different parts of England, and it was an exceptional case for the expenses of prosecutions to be paid by the county allowance. On the question of solicitors accepting trusteeships in bankruptcy, he agreed in the conclusions of the Chairman. He then remarked on the difficulties in the way of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion with respect to the remuneration of solicitors by contract, and concluded by moving "That the cordial and hearty thanks of this meeting be presented to the Chairman for his able and admirable address, and that he be requested to allow it to be printed, and circulated not only amongst the members of the association but of the profession generally."

Mr. H. GASKELL TAYLOR seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. KIMBER, of London, corroborated the remarks of the Chairman on the Bankruptcy Bill.

Mr. HULL, of Liverpool, commented on the report of the Judicial Commission, and concluded by proposing a resolution which had been passed at Liverpool, "That the committee approve generally of the report as far as it goes, but would like to see the suggestions contained in it put into a more practical form by the introduction of a bill next year."

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Leeds, seconded the motion.

A discussion ensued, in the course of which the CHAIRMAN objected to the association sitting in judgment on the report of the commissioners, who, in fact, had not yet concluded their labours, having, with the three additions he had previously mentioned, been recently re-appointed.

Mr. CLABON, of London, remarked that in his opinion there never was a commission that more admirably concluded the first portion of their labours by the production of a lucid and excellent report. He therefore trusted the motion would be withdrawn.

Mr. HULL explained that he did not wish to convey any censure on the commission, but his object was merely to save time by obtaining a more practical statement of their labours. He then withdrew the motion.

Mr. SHAEN moved "That in the opinion of this meeting there is no professional objection to solicitors accepting the office of trustees in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Bill."

Mr. KIMBER seconded the motion.

A discussion followed, in the course of which it was urged that it was more the province of the Association to discuss subjects than to pass resolutions, and, on a suggestion from the Chairman, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. TORR, of London, spoke on the question of the remuneration of solicitors, and the desirability of a revised scale of costs. He asked the Chairman as to the present position of the question, and the steps which had been taken in the matter.

In reply, the CHAIRMAN gave an account of an interview on the subject with the Master of the Rolls, Vice-Chancellors Stuart and Page Wood, and several of the clerks. He had pressed upon their consideration the insufficiency of the remuneration of solicitors, and pointed out that the state of things which formerly justified the fixed sums of mark and noble had long since ceased to exist, and that the profession should be paid according to ability. A consideration of the question was promised, but although a year has passed nothing definite had resulted from the above interview. He thought if Lord Cairns had retained the Great Seal something would have been done. The present Lord Chancellor did not appear very favourably inclined to the propositions.

Three papers were next read, the first by Mr. CLABON on "The Fusion of Law and Equity;" the second by Mr. F. D. LAWRENCE, of Liverpool on "Legal Education;" and the third by Mr. C. J. SAUNDERS, of Birmingham on "The Union of the Two Branches of the Legal Profession" considered with a special reference to contemplated Law Reforms."

Mr. JEVONS, of Liverpool, then spoke at length on the scheme for the university of law as suggested by the executive committee appointed at the meeting of deputations from provincial law societies held at Leeds last September. He quite endorsed every word in the paper of Mr. Saunders, and said that the meeting at Leeds, to which he referred, was in no way antagonistic to that society. He combated some of the objections to the proposed scheme of legal education, and alluded to the agitation which had been going on at Liverpool against the practical exclusion of attorneys from the magistracy. The steps which had, since the Leeds meeting, been taken with respect to the proposed university he described, stating that the Lord Chancellor had approved of the scheme, and a bill had been prepared. Mr. Jevons concluded by maintaining that solicitors ought to be as highly educated as the members of the bar, the members of the profession being greatly inferior in knowledge of the law, compared with other countries, through the want of a thorough legal university training.

Mr. CLABON thought the profession of solicitor and advocate had better remain as at present. With respect to the law university, he thought the more education both branches had the better. He concluded by an allusion to the difficult question of the funds that would be required.

Mr. H. ANDERSON, of York, disapproved of any scheme which would entitle solicitors to act as barristers and barristers as solicitors. He concluded by suggesting that any solicitor should be, on producing a certificate from the Incorporated Law Society that he had passed successfully all examinations, was duly qualified, and once being in practice, conducted himself in a proper and honourable manner, and was a member of the Law Society or some provincial law association, be entitled to be admitted a student of any of the Inns of Court, and at the expiration of three months from that date be entitled to be called to the bar.

Mr. HULL lauded the working of the New York system, where the status of attorneys and advocates was the same, though each had their own clients. There were from ninety to one hundred barristers in the House of Commons, and this solid phalanx monopolised all "the loaves and fishes" that were at the disposal of Government. The law university he had no doubt would be self-supporting.

Mr. ROBERTS, of Hull, dissented from the proposal of amalgamating the two branches of the legal profession; but was deeply interested in the question of legal education. The education of solicitors was very defective. He advocated the same educational facilities for the legal as for other learned professions, and with reference to the requisite funds they had all seen the funds of institutions which were not being satisfactorily employed made more available for educational purposes. He thought if this rule were applied to the funds of the Inns of Court there would be no injustice if the money was applied for the benefit of the members of the legal profession. He thoroughly agreed with the observations made by Mr. Anderson, and thought there should be an opportunity afforded for members of one branch of the profession entering the other if thought desirable. Nothing would facilitate this more than education at one college.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Leeds, briefly spoke in favour of the amalgamation of the profession.

Mr. SHAWN, of London, spoke favourably both as regards the public and the legal body of the amalgamation of the branches of the profession. With reference to the proposed university, he suggested that it would be better than establishing a specific university to have a legal department in some of the present universities of the country. The funds of the Inns of Court belonged to the profession, and might be to some extent applied to the advancement of the education of the legal profession.

Mr. GRAYSTON, of York, read a paper on "The Law of Primogeniture," describing its origin and progress down to the present day.

The meeting then adjourned.

Wednesday, Oct. 26.—The proceedings commenced with the discussion of Mr. Grayston's paper on "Primogeniture."

Mr. DEES said the bill of last session was one of the most ill-considered bills ever introduced into Parliament. It appeared to him to be an unnecessary change in the law.

Mr. BROXLEY pointed out how the present state of the law worked in many instances a great injustice. He did not in any way regard the greatness of this country as dependent on the maintenance of the law of primogeniture, and he gave in his hearty adherence to the proposed measure.

Mr. PAYNE, of Bath, pointed out several evils which might be obviated by legislation in connection with the subject.

Mr. CLABON, of London, then read a paper on the "Proposal for establishing a Law Benevolent Corporation."

Mr. PAYNE, of Liverpool, then read a paper on the "Charge by Ad-Valorem for Mortgages," after which

Mr. TORR proposed the following resolution:—"That this meeting desires the committee of management to give their best attention to the subject of the bill lately brought into the House of Commons by Mr. Rathbone for the purpose of amending the existing mode of remuneration, and to memorialise the Lord Chancellor (and such other judges as may be necessary) for a suitable increase in the rate and amounts of such portions of the costs of solicitors and attorneys as are paid by scale." With reference to the open system of contracts there was the objection that it might give rise to a system of under-selling each other in the profession. The object of Mr. Rathbone's bill was, however, to seek to obtain some more substantial remuneration for their services than the present scale allowed. There were many classes of business in which special contracts were impossible; and it was undeniable that the present scale of costs was totally inadequate as the solicitor's remuneration. He specially referred to more important cases, in respect to which there was merely the same compensation as in the paltry and ordinary ones.

The CHAIRMAN thought it would not be wise to in any way commit themselves as an association by sanctioning the bill of Mr. Rathbone, the provisions of which they perhaps had not all considered. Without doing this they could vote in favour of the amendment of the solicitors' remuneration scale.

Mr. GASKELL TAYLOR expressed his concurrence in the views of Mr. Torr.

After some discussion the motion, on being put to the meeting, was carried unanimously.

Mr. PETGRAVE, of Bath, next read a paper on "Requisitions of Titles and Open Contracts."

A discussion ensued, in which Mr. AVISON, of Liverpool, Mr. W. P. HUSBAND, of York, Mr. JOHNSON, of Birmingham, Mr. PAYNE, of Liverpool, and others took part, the speakers generally regarding the suggestions of the paper very favourably.

Mr. KIMBER, of London, read a paper on "Appellate Jurisdiction in Criminal Matters."

Mr. BREAREY, of York, made a few remarks on the subject, and called attention to the case of William Henry Barber, a solicitor, who was sentenced to transportation for forging a will. It afterwards transpired, through the confession of one of the witnesses, that the transported solicitor was entirely innocent, and he subsequently obtained a vote of £5,000 from Parliament. Mr. Brearey thought if a Court of Appeal had existed at that time he would doubtless have been able to prove his innocence.

The CHAIRMAN said that although a court of criminal appeal would be useful in investigating such a case as that referred to by Mr. Brearey, the public and the profession were very much divided in opinion as to whether Barber was guilty or innocent.

The reading of papers and the discussions having terminated,

The CHAIRMAN proposed a vote of thanks to the members of the Yorkshire Law Society for their kind and cordial reception and the almost regal hospitality which they had evinced towards the members of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman was then moved by Mr. SNEYMOORE, seconded by Mr. WARR, both of York, and carried unanimously.

Mr. MOODY, President, and Mr. WALKER, Secretary of the Yorkshire Society, received a similar compliment, and the proceedings ended.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on Tuesday the 2nd inst., Mr. Hargreaves in the chair, the following question was discussed:—"Does the present position of Cuba justify the interference of the United States?" The debate was opened by Mr. Warrington in the affirmative, but was eventually decided in the negative by a majority of nine. Six gentlemen were elected members of the society, and the total number present was twenty-six.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Early in the week the funds were steady, as also foreign securities; in railways but little was doing. The half yearly transfer day and holiday, of course, slackened everything. Afterwards the discount demand quickened sensibly, in anticipation of a rise in the Bank discount rate on Thursday. Those anticipations were justified, the rate having now been advanced from 2½, to which it was lowered on August 19th, to 3, but little alteration in the markets has been produced by the change. The funds are dull. The railway market experienced a short fall at first, but afterwards began to rally. Foreign securities are declining. There seems on the whole no prospect that the present high prices of investments will be materially lowered for a long time to come.

Mr. JAMES STANSFELD, jun., M.P. for Halifax, and Third Lord of the Treasury, who has received the appointment of Financial Secretary of the Treasury, in the place of Mr. Ayrton, gazetted as First Commissioner of Works, is a barrister of the Inner Temple, is a son of Mr. James Stansfeld, formerly a solicitor, and now Judge of the Halifax County Court, by Emma, daughter of the Rev. John Ralph, of Halifax. He was born at Halifax in 1820, and was educated at University College, London, having graduated as Bachelor of Laws at the London University in 1844. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1849. In April, 1859, he was elected M.P. for Halifax, was in office as a Lord of the Admiralty in Lord Palmerston's administration from April, 1863, till April, 1864, and served as Under-Secretary of State for India for a short period in 1866, when he gave up the post in consequence of the adverse criticism evoked by his connection with Mazzini. When Mr. Gladstone's Government was formed in December, 1868, he was appointed Third Lord of the Treasury. Mr. Stansfeld married, in 1841, Caroline, daughter of Mr. William Henry Ashurst, solicitor to the Post-office.

Mr. ACTON SMEE AYRTON, M.P. for the Tower Hamlets, and Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who has been appointed First Commissioner of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings, in succession to Mr. Layard, appointed Ambassador at Madrid, is a member of the Middle Temple, is a son of the late Mr. Frederick Ayrton, a barrister of Gray's-inn, and formerly of Bombay, by the only child of the late Lieutenant-Colonel Nugent. He was born at Kew in 1816, and was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in April, 1853; he practised for a few years on the Home Circuit and at the Sussex Sessions. Mr. Ayrton unsuccessfully contested the Tower Hamlets in 1852, but was returned to Parliament as member for that borough in April, 1857. On Mr. Gladstone's accession to power, in December of last year, Mr. Ayrton was selected to fill the post of Financial Secretary to the Treasury. In 1867 he promoted, with Mr. Tite, the Metropolitan Improvement Bill, and with Mr. O'Beirne the Pawnbroking Bill. Mr. Ayrton is one of the Royal Commissioners for inquiring into the constitution of the Law Courts.

Inquiry has been made into the accounts of Mr. Robert Shaw; stamp distributor for county Cork. He has admitted defalcations to the extent of £15,800.

It is announced that Mr. William Stockley, solicitor, of Liverpool, who about two years ago absconded from that city under very painful circumstances, has recently died at Barcelona. A short time ago (13 S. J. 1000) we had occasion to comment, from a legal point of view, upon a case of Withington v. Tate (17 W. R. 559), which arose out of Mr. Stockley's defalcations. The case was an extremely hard one, and the unfortunate mortgagor, who had repaid his mortgage-money to Mr. Stockley, as the solicitor through whom the advance was made, had to pay the money over again, the whole having been misappropriated by Mr. Stockley.

THE NEW ELECTION JUDGES.—Mr. Justice Mellor, Mr. Justice Byles, and Mr. Baron Bramwell have been nominated election judges for the ensuing year.

VALUE OF PROPERTY AT THE WEST END.—At Mr. Robins' sale at the Mart, on Tuesday last, a spirited competition sprung up for a long leasehold house and shop situate in Market-street, Mayfair, let at £40 per annum. The lot was put up at £250, and was ultimately sold for £1,220.

EXAMINATION OF LAW STUDENTS.—A preliminary examination of law students in general knowledge was held at the Athenæum, Temple-row, on the 27th and 28th inst., before Mr. C. T. Saunders and Mr. Thomas Martineau, the superintending local examiners, when no less than twenty-five candidates presented themselves for examination, Birmingham being the centre for a very wide district. The subjects for examination comprised English and Latin grammar, English history, geography, arithmetic, and one ancient or modern European language.—Birmingham Daily Post.

—For Sale by Private Contract, the improved Rental of Warehouse Premises, one mile south of London-bridge, held on lease for an unexpired term of 68 years, at £100 per annum ground rent and £10 per annum for fire insurance. An underlease of the property has been granted to the occupying tenant for a term, of which 63 years are unexpired, at the rent of £1,500 per annum. Price £20,000, of which £10,000 may remain on mortgage at 5 per cent. per annum for a term of years if required, leaving the purchaser a return of 9 per cent. per annum on an investment of £10,000. The property occupies a first-class situation for general commercial purposes, and the high respectability of the tenant, who has laid out a large sum in permanent improvements, and is carrying on a most profitable business on the premises, the improved rental of £1,390 per annum offers a most eligible first class investment.—For further particulars, and orders to view, apply to Messrs. LONDON, NOVEMBER 13, 1869.

THE HABITUAL CRIMINALS Act of last session (32 & 33 Vict. c. 99) seems likely to give rise to several questions of construction which might have been avoided by a more careful wording of the statute.

One of the most important provisions of the Act is that when any person is convicted on indictment of any of certain specified offences, "and he be proved to have been previously convicted of" any of certain offences there specified, he shall be subject to police supervision, after the termination of his period of imprisonment. Nothing is said as to the mode of proof in these cases, as to whether such proof is necessarily at the second trial, or whether it may be afterwards, or whether or not the previous conviction must be on an indictment. It seems likely that it will be held that the former practice (for the proof of a former conviction as an aggravation of a prisoner's criminality has been rendered admissible evidence by several statutes) would be followed under this statute. The words of the older statutes where the proof of a former offence is provided for are, however, quite different from those of the Habitual Criminals Act, and although the practice already existing may be followed, it is not likely that it will be acquiesced in without judicial decision on these questions. About one point, however, there was a doubt under the old statutes, and this doubt has been allowed to remain in the new one. In Reg. v. Summers (17 W. R. 384) the question was raised as to the effect of proving by oral evidence a prior conviction, which was not alleged in the indictment, and when no record or certificate of the conviction was produced. The judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal did not deal with this question in detail, and there is therefore some doubt as to the law upon the point.

When the bill for the punishment of habitual criminals was introduced into Parliament, it contained a clause (section 19) that a previous conviction might be proved, although not charged in the indictment, and without production of the record of such previous conviction. We noticed (13 Sol. Jour. 37), in commenting upon the rule, that this clause was of considerable technical importance, and we especially referred to the case of Reg. v. Summers. The clause was, however, struck out, and no similar provision has been substituted for it. It might have been thought that a point like this, which arose shortly before the passing of the Act, and to which public attention had been directed, would have been provided for: such, however, is not the case.

The practical importance of this question is shown by the fact that it has, already arisen under the Habitual Criminals Act before the recorder at Bolton, in a case which was very like Reg. v. Summers. There was no charge in the indictment of a prior conviction, which was, however, proved by vide tunc evidence. The question may arise whether the prisoner (who was convicted) will be subject to police supervision on the expiration of his sentence. No opinion was judicially expressed at the time on the point, as the police supervision is no part of the sentence to be pronounced by the Court.

Besides these questions doubt has also been felt as to the effect of the provisions of section 11, by which, on proof of a previous conviction, the burden of proof on an indictment for receiving stolen goods is thrown on the accused.

In due time, no doubt, this Act will receive a judicial construction, and the law will be ascertained. It is, however, much to be regretted that so important a criminal statute as the Habitual Criminals Act of last session should be so carelessly drawn as to show upon its face so many and such serious doubts.

HOW IS THE ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES in the Courts of Bankruptcy to be enforced after the 1st of January next? This is one of the most important, and by no means the least difficult, of the questions which must arise under the new Act.

The Acts at present in force contain several sections dealing with the subject. Section 100 of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, empowers the Court before adjudication to summon before it any person whom it shall believe capable of giving any information concerning the trading of or any act of bankruptcy committed by the supposed bankrupt, and to require such person to produce documents for the same purpose. Section 120 of the same Act empowers the Court after adjudication to summon any person known or suspected to have any of the bankrupt's estate in his possession, or who is supposed to be indebted to the bankrupt, or whom it may believe capable of giving any information concerning the person, trading, dealings, or estate of the bankrupt, or concerning any act of bankruptcy committed by him, or any information material to the full disclosure of his dealings; and to require the production of documents by such person. Section 215 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, gives to the Court of Bankruptcy the same power which was conferred upon the Superior Courts of Law by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 34, that is, the power of issuing writs of subpoena which shall run to any part of the United Kingdom. There are other provisions relating to the same subject, but these are the most material.

All these sections, together with the rest of the existing bankruptcy law, will cease to be in force on the 1st January next. And the new Act contains only one section giving any express power to summon witnesses. Section 96 empowers the Court, on the application of the trustee, and after adjudication, to summon before it the bankrupt or his wife, or any person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of the bankrupt, or supposed to be indebted to the bankrupt, or whom the Court may deem capable of giving information respecting the bankrupt, his trade, dealing, or property; and to compel such person to produce documents. And if the person summoned fails to obey the summons, he may be brought up for examination by warrant. This section, it is clear, is quite inadequate if taken by itself. It makes no provision, for instance, for summoning a witness to prove the trading on the act of bankruptcy in order to obtain adjudication, and even after adjudication no power of calling witnesses is given by it to any one except the trustee. It is necessary to look, therefore, whether there are any general provisions in the Act wide enough to cover the deficiency.

It may be suggested in the first place that when the Legislature creates a jurisdiction it impliedly gives the power to summon such witnesses as may be necessary for its exercise, upon the principle cuiusque aliquis quid concedit, concedere videtur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest. And such an application of the maxim has in fact been suggested in somewhat analogous cases. But this seems to us a contention which it would be very difficult to sustain in any case, and especially in the case of the Court of Bankruptcy, where the functions are so very unlike those of ordinary courts. It is much against this view that in every court of statutory jurisdiction, from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to the county court, special enactments for the summoning of witnesses have been made. Nor does it seem to us that the fact of a court being of record alters the case. That gives the Court a power of compelling obedience to its orders, but does not necessarily determine what orders it may make.

Secondly, it may be said that the Act does not create new courts, but only gives new jurisdiction to old ones already possessing the requisite powers. This is probably so. Section 65 does say that the London Court shall continue to be a court of record. But then in giving new jurisdiction the Legislature has at the same moment taken away all its old powers. The county courts, however, will continue to have their old jurisdiction as well as their new. And it may very probably be held that such powers as those of summoning witnesses and the like are to be treated as belonging to the courts generally and as exercisable in respect of any branch of its jurisdiction. If so section 85 of the County Courts Act, 1846, will apply, by which either party to a suit or proceeding may obtain at the office of the clerk of the court summonses to witnesses. And the difficulty will then be merely to say who are the parties to a bankruptcy.

Lastly, section 65 says that the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy "shall have all the powers, jurisdiction, and privileges" of any judge of a superior court of law, or of the Court of Chancery. And section 66 says that every judge of a local court shall have, in addition to his ordinary powers as a county court judge, "all the powers and jurisdiction" of a judge of the Court of Chancery. Are these words wide enough to give a power of summoning witnesses? They will probably be held so; but the language is singularly inappropriate. It is almost absurd to speak of the issue of a writ of summons, or an ordinary writ of subpoena, or any other common form writ, which is obtainable as of right, and over the issue of which no judge has the slightest control, nor any power to grant or refuse it, as a "power, jurisdiction, or privilege" of the judge. However, the words will probably be construed loosely, in order to avoid an extreme inconvenience, and cure the palpable blunder which has been committed in not re-enacting the old sections. Except in this way we see no mode in which the London Court can obtain power to summon witnesses; nor any in which the local courts can do so except in this way or the other which we have suggested.

One thing is clear, that the local courts will no longer have any power to issue subpoenas out of the jurisdiction (that is, by section 80, England), though the London Court will; for the issue of such subpoenas, though a power of a common law judge, is not within the power of a judge of the Court of Chancery.

THE OFFICE OF CORONER is an open one, although in practice it is almost invariably, if not exclusively, filled by solicitors, with a sprinkling of medical men. Our medical contemporaries entertain the idea that the coroner ought always to be a man of medicine. We ourselves hold the view that, ceteris paribus, the man of law has had the best training for such an office. Even assuming that all the evidence on inquiries into the cause of death is medical evidence, which is not the case, the superintendence of such an inquiry will be best conducted by a man habituated to court business and judicial investigation, and familiar with those rules of evidence which the experience of the past has stored up for the guidance of the future. The reason of this position it would be hard to gainsay, and indeed its opponents do not attempt to gainsay it, but rather direct their efforts to picking out from time individual instances of miscarriage on the part of the obnoxious lawyer coroners. Now, to take refuge in single instances is an admission of weakness.

A recent number of the Lancet supplies an instance of this species of argumentum ad hominem:—

"CROWN'S QUEST LAW.—The week last past has been productive of two unusually remarkable examples of the wisdom and urbanity that characterise the legal coroner; and the circumstances which induced two of these luminaries so to distinguish themselves are worthy of being placed on record."

— and so forth.

Then follows the first instance:—It appears that one of the Nottinghamshire county coroners "had the assurance" to caution a medical man who, in his opinion, had acted indiscreetly in the matter of granting a certificate of the cause of death. Thereupon the Lancet:—

"In considering the force and meaning of these words, it is necessary to remind our readers that a local attorney cannot be invested with judicial wisdom by the votes of freeholders. For such a one to presume to instruct a medical man about his own business would be ludicrous, if it were not so sad."

In the second instance a coroner is taken to task because "the jury were allowed by the coroner to attach to their verdict" what is considered by our contemporary to be an unjust censure on another medical man. In neither case, so far as we can learn from our contemporary's recapitulation, does he establish anything against the coroner. That, however, is beside the question. What we wish to point out is, that this style of argument argues in itself a lack of confidence in the ratio of our contemporary's case. When certain reasons are advanced against it, it is no answer to say—"Oh, but here, and here, are instances in which legal coroners have done" bad, harsh, or silly things—as the case may be. We should be sorry to say that lawyer coroners never do wrong, but to reply to arguments for their general superiority over medical coroners by hunting up instances in which they may have done wrong, is no more an answer to those arguments than a recapitulation of instances in which gentlemen have broken the bank at Baden Baden is a reply to the assertion that punting is not a profitable occupation. If we had been driven in upon such a line of defence, how easy it would have been for us to make capital of the inquest held by a medical coroner at Abergyle; we prefer, however, to go to the root of the matter.

The next number of the Lancet contains a paragraph in which a "Mr. Coroner Craddock" is censured for announcing, after holding an inquest which proved to have been unnecessary, to the effect that he left the advisability of holding an inquest entirely to the police. Now Mr. Craddock, if we mistake not, is a medical coroner, but our contemporary writes respecting him in quite a different tone to that of the two censures first quoted, besides omitting to draw from his instance the corresponding counter-inference against medical coroners.

There are strong men and weak men in every profession. We do not assert that for every vacant coronership the lawyer candidate is always the right man. We always wish that the best man may be elected. If the doctor were evidently a better man than the lawyer, we should give our vote for him, and as the office is an open one, if a miller or a surveyor were also a candidate and appeared better still, we should vote for him in preference to either. What we do say is that the lawyer is, ceteris paribus, far better qualified for the office than the doctor, and we have often given our reasons. In the meantime we may be permitted to express the hope that next session will witness the re-introduction of Mr. Goldney's County Coroners Election Bill, for if there is one inconvenient thing under the sun, it is the present mode of electing county coroners.

SOME MONTHS AGO we noticed that a genteel convict Sir G. Culling Eardley, who had been sentenced to a term of imprisonment for bigamy, had received a free pardon because the confinement did not agree with his health, and might probably kill him. We could not help noticing that the health of less genteel convicts does not receive a similar consideration at the hands of the Home Secretary. And it is usually a received opinion that if a man commits a crime he must take the consequences. Sir G. Culling Eardley was then liberated on condition of his leaving England, and not returning until his term had expired. He was lately brought before a magistrate, and charged with obtaining £5 by a fraudulent cheque. When brought up on remand, the prosecutor "declined to proceed," and the prisoner was consequently discharged. If we had a different law as to public prosecutions, this miscarriage of justice would have been avoided. We do not, however, feel clear, from the newspaper report of the case, that the magistrate ought not to have committed the prisoner and bound over the prosecutor to prosecute on a prima facie case. However that may be, this is an instance in which twice running the gantlet prisoner has obtained a peculiar and specially genteel description of justice.

WE HAVE RECEIVED by the courtesy of the Lord Chancellor a draft copy of the forthcoming Regula Generales under the new Bankruptcy Act. The draft, however, being merely forwarded to us as an invitation to make suggestions for emendation, we do not feel at liberty to make either extracts or comments.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN OUR INDIAN EMPIRE.

The current number of the Edinburgh Review contains an article upon "Indian Judges, British and Native," in which some, though not all, the defects of the present system of administering justice in British India are pointed out. These defects are so glaring and call so imperatively for a remedy, that, did we not know how little interest is felt in Indian affairs in England, we should be surprised at the present regime having lasted so long. What that regime is not one person in ten thousand in England knows. There are, then, in India three classes of civil judges—(1) native judges; (2) zillah judges, who are always covenanted servants of the Crown, and therefore generally Englishmen; (3) the judges of the High Court, who are appointed by the Crown chiefly from the most distinguished of the lawyers practising in India. All civil suits, with but few exceptions, come before the native judges in the first instance. There are a few suits which the zillah judge can alone try, but he has power to try all suits brought in his zillah, or district, if he thinks fit. The chief functions of a zillah judge are to hear appeals, on matters of fact as well as points of law, from the native judges subordinate to him, and his decisions may be appealed against to the High Court on points of law only where the decision is upon an appeal from a native judge, but upon matters of fact as well as points of law when the decision was upon an original suit. Upon turning to a volume of Indian High Court Reports it will be seen that the High Court is constantly overruling the decisions on appeal of the zillah judges and affirming those of the native judges overruled by the zillah judges—i.e., pronouncing the native judges right and the zillah judges wrong, and to such a pitch has this proceeded that Indian litigants are beginning to regard the zillah courts as a species of lottery. The source of this evil is easy to be found—the zillah judges are called upon to undertake duties which they are not qualified to perform. We would here quote and endorse the following from the Edinburgh Review:—

We wish it clearly to be understood that nothing is further from our intention than to cast any reproach on those Englishmen who hold judicial offices in India. A body of men more upright, more zealous, more desirous of performing their duty and of holding the balance of justice evenly between man and man, we fully believe never existed. Nor do we deny that there are among them men who have conceived a far higher notion of their duties than those in power would seem to wish to force upon them. We speak only of the mass, and all we say of them is that they are called upon to perform an impossible task,—to make bricks without straw, to be the instrument of a sham and a deception.

The covenanted servant of the Crown after his two years' probation in England—and what a farce that probation is under the auspices of the Civil Service Commissioners we need not mention—is sent out to India. "There"—we quote the words of Mr. Look, one of the judges at the High Court at Calcutta—

He remains at the sadder station of a district for a very short period. In the course of a year from his joining he is liable to be sent to take charge of a subdivision. For the next fifteen years of his career he is employed in the duties of a magistrate and collector. Without any training in the particular duties of a civil judge, or any knowledge of the law by which his proceedings are to be guided, a man, after fifteen or more years' service as magistrate or collector, or both, is transferred to the bench and expected to control a number of subordinate courts the judges of which may have commenced and continued their judicial career before he entered the service.

To give some idea of the monstrosity of such a system the Edinburgh Review says:—

If a man who had divided fifteen years of his life between the duties of chief constable of a county, a land agent, a justice of the peace, and a clerk in Somerset House, were to be suddenly placed as a judge in the Court of Queen's Bench, it would be something of the same kind, and not more absurd.

The astonishing thing is that men like Sir Charles Trevelyan, Sir Henry Harrington, and Sir Edward Ryan do not see the system in this light, although Mr. Look, Mr. Howard, and Mr. Maine, all equally competent to form an opinion on the point, do. The chief—in fact the only—argument of those who support the present system is that the state of Indian society is so inartificial, and the law is so simple, that anyone can administer it. But what can be more complicated than the land tenure of India, while the commonest relation of social life, that of the Hindu family, is so difficult to be conceived and understood that no European has ever written an exhaustive treatise upon it. As to the simplicity of the law administered in the British Indian Courts, Mr. Grady, in his work on Hindu law, thus describes it:—

(1) The Hindu law; (2) the Mahomedan law; (3) the common law, as it prevailed in England in the year 1726, and which has not subsequently been altered by statutes expressly extending to India, or by Acts of the Legislative Council of India; (4) the statute law, which prevailed in England in 1726, and which has not been subsequently altered by statutes especially extending to India, or by the Acts of the Legislative Council of India; (5) Acts of Parliament expressly relating to India enacted since 1726, and statutes which have been extended to India by the Acts of the Legislative Council of India; (6) the common law of the land; (7) the codes of civil and criminal procedure; (8) the revenue law; (9) the civil law as it obtains in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts of England; (10) the regulations made previously to the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 85, and the Acts of the Legislative Council of India made under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 85.

If, in addition to this, it be remembered that where the judges have no law to guide them they are to decide according to equity and good conscience, and that the High Court of Calcutta has ruled that the equity which is to form their ratio decidendi is the equity of the Court of Chancery in England, the simplicity of the law which the zillah judges have to administer will be hardly conceded.

One thing which the writer of the article in the Edinburgh Review either ignores or is unacquainted with is that in the presidency of Bombay there is a difference from the system adopted in the other presidencies. In Bombay a civilian shortly after his arrival is obliged to elect between the judicial side and the revenue side of the service. If he chooses the judicial he is made an assistant to a zillah judge before he is considered competent to discharge the full duties of zillah judge. It is true that, considering he has, as assistant zillah judge, a far more difficult jurisdiction than a county court judge in England, the age at which he is appointed, averaging about twenty-seven years, is absurd; still, this is preferable to that in force in the other presidencies as tending to provide a kind of apprenticeship for the full jurisdiction of the zillah court. If this system were extended to the whole of India, and if the selected candidates for the Indian Civil Service were compelled, during their two years of probation in England, to study the leading principles of law and jurisprudence thoroughly instead of only having, as they now have, to cram for a few weeks in each half-year, and thus to pass an easy examination, there would be some chance of justice being administered in India as it is at home, and the Anglo-Indian judges being looked up to with respect instead of being, as they are, in the hands of their subordinate officials, and the laughing-stock of the clever native lawyers who practise in their courts. It is notorious that the zillah judges in India are often much more dependent than they ought to be upon the officials of their courts for their imperfect knowledge of the language in which justice is administered therein. Mr. Maine is responsible for the truth of the story that a Bengal civilian was recently made a zillah judge, in spite of his protestations of incompetency, and even of his avowal of his ignorance of the language in use in the court over which he was to preside. Therefore it is not to be wondered at that, although the judges are above suspicion, there is an outcry among suitors at the expense of bribing the officials of the courts. Again, it is equally notorious that the native lawyers cite authorities in argument which the zillah judges have never heard of; nay more, that they take objections to evidence on the chance that the presiding judge will, through ignorance, allow them.

A mere separation of judicial from non-judicial functions will not meet the defect. Those civilians who adopt the judicial service must have proper preliminary training in law, and this we commend to the attention of the Secretary of State for India and his Council.

COVENANTS TO SETTLE AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

No. II.

In possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy. Difficulties sometimes arise from the omission of these words. Thus in Atcherley v. Du Moulin (2 K. & J. 186), where W. was entitled to a legacy contingently on her surviving A., and the words "be or become entitled" only were used, the legacy was held not to be bound, H. having died in A.'s lifetime, so that the interest remained contingent during the coverture. It was doubted whether such a covenant would extend to reversionary interests, there being a direction that the property the subject of the covenant should be vested in the trustees on trusts to convert, &c. (but see as to this Hughes v. Young, 1 N. R. 166). The Master of the Rolls expressed an opinion that in such a case a vested interest would not be bound if liable to be divested; and in Dering v. Kynaston (6 Eq. 210, 16 W. R. 819) the words used being "be or become possessed, interested, or entitled," held that a vested remainder in tail, which fell into possession after the death of H., and was then barred, did not come within the covenant. In this case the preceding estates were life interests and a remainder in tail to the sons of one of the life tenants, and at the death of H. there were no such sons living. We cannot see, however, that this circumstance, although it made W.'s interest much more valuable, affected the question whether it came within the covenant or not, and if bound by the covenant the freehold into which it was converted by W. by barring the entail would, we think, also have been bound in equity. We cannot dwell longer upon these points, but may notice that the cases coming under this and the preceding head may be usefully compared.

So far as the covenant is binding on the wife there is no doubt that it binds property given to her absolutely for her separate use (Ex parte Young, 1 Ir. Eq. N. S. 294, Campbell v. Bainbridge, 17 W. R. 5, 6 L. R. Eq. 269, and cases cited). In Brooks v. Keith separate property was held not to be bound because the covenant extended only to property so far as H. should become interested therein. It would seem, however, that interests given to her in like manner for her life would not be bound (Townshend v. Harrowby, 6 W. R. 413, 4 Jur. N. S. 352; Ewart v. Ewart, 11 Ha. 277, 1 W. R. 466). This question was neatly raised in Dunoon v. Cannan (4 W. R. 2, 21 Beav. 307), where by the settlement H. took a life interest and W. the corpus, and H.'s assignees in bankruptcy claimed such a life interest acquired by W. during the coverture. Their claim was disallowed, and it was pointed out that the most they could claim would be the dividends of the invested income treated as it accrued as capital. The rule laid down by the present Lord Chancellor in Re Mainwaring's Settlement (14 W. R. 887, 2 L. R. Eq. 487) is probably correct, that the Court will not hold property to be comprised in the covenant which will not fit the trusts of the settlement; as, for example, estates for life of W. and annuities to her. It must be observed that if this be the rule the dictum of Knight Bruce, L.J., in Townshend v. Harrowby, is correct, that life interests of W., whether for the separate use or not, are excluded. The objection to the adoption of this rule is that an interest given to W. pur autre vie could hardly be excepted, and after all, what is the difference in principle? But for the obligation to convert generally imposed by the settlement, we are inclined to think that the decisions as to these life interests would have been different. (White v. Briggs, and another case reported in 22 Beav. 186, may be referred to on this point.)

In the case of Re Mainwaring's Settlement just referred to, where a testatrix, having originally directed some property bequeathed to W. to be paid to the trustees on the trusts of the settlement, by a later codicil authorized her executors to pay any portion to W. for her separate use, free from the engagements, &c., of H., it was held that W. was entitled, the Court considering that the testatrix had clearly shown her intention that W. should receive as much of the property as she required independent of the trusts of the settlement. Property over which W. has a power of appointment given to her is not bound unless she exercises the power in her own favour (Townshend v. Harrowby and Ewart v. Ewart); and real property purchased out of savings of separate estate is not affected by a covenant to settle property which should come to or vest in W. by descent, devise, or gift (Hughes v. Jones, 11 W. R. 898, 2 N. R. 417). Mr. Davidson, however, suggests that such savings should be expressly excepted, and no doubt as the covenant is sometimes worded they would be held to be included.

The word "expectancy" gives a wide scope to the covenant, as it provides for the case of W. being presumptive or expectant heir of a person who does not die until after the coverture has determined, so as to bind by estoppel W. then inheriting. It might also extend to the case of property devised to W. under a will made during the coverture by a testator who did not die until afterwards. In consequence of section 33 of the Wills Act it was contended that as a legatee being a child or grandchild of a testator was entitled in certain cases, although predeceasing him, to the legacy, as if he or she had survived the testator, such legacy to W. would fall within the usual covenant, although the testator died after W. (Pearce v. Graham, 11 W. R. 415, 32 L. J. Ch. 359). The decision being to the contrary Mr. Pridcaux has adopted a clause which expressly binds in such an event.

Except jewels . . . furniture . . . plate, &c., which it is hereby declared shall belong to W. for her separate use. Sometimes property already settled to W.'s separate use is also excepted, and then the covenant will, in respect of interests of that nature, be inoperative (Coventry v. Coventry, 11 W. R. 868, 32 Beav. 612), but as the covenant will in most cases, like the rest of the settlement, be intended for the benefit of the children also, it is not desirable that this exception should be made. The exception of jewels, &c., is necessary, because although there may be a trust for conversion in the settlement, this would perhaps not be sufficient to excludé them from its operation (see Willoughby v. Middleton and Milford v. Peile). Articles of consumption left to the wife are of course not a subject of settlement, and no exception of them is necessary.

Then, and in every such case, H. and W., and all other necessary parties, shall, at the cost of the said trust estate, as soon as circumstances will admit, and to the satisfaction of [the trustees], assure the said real or personal property to, or otherwise cause the same to be vested in [the trustees.] We have already remarked on the importance of this part of the covenant, showing whether the acts of H. & W., or of H. only, are stipulated for. We may, however, notice here that if the covenant in terms applied to the acts of H. only, neither the words "cause to be vested," nor "concur with W. in selling," would create an obligation on her part (Ramsden v. Smith and Roid v. Kenrick). If, as is sometimes the case, the covenant is to settle "at the request of the trustees," the request is not a condition precedent, and the property is bound without such request having been made (Macbruce v. Lane).

Upon trust . . . (but as to reversionary property, not until it shall fall into possession, unless it shall appear to [trustees] that the capital of the trust estate will probably be injured by deferring the sale) [usual trust to convert] so much of said property as shall not consist of money or [authorised investments], or of an annuity or annuities, or other estate or interest for the life of W., or for any term or period determinable on her death. From the authorities we have cited the last restrictions appear unnecessary, as such interests would not fall within the scope of the covenant. It would not, however, be prudent to omit them until the law is clearly settled.

We must now devote a few words to the omitted clauses, "at one and the same time and from the same source," and "of the value of £ and upwards." The recent case of Re Mackenzie's Settlement (15 W. R. 662, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 345) shows the difficulties attending the construction of these words. The limit in that case was £400, and W. was, at the time of marriage, entitled in reversion to about £470 Consols as her own share, and about £65 Consols as representative of a brother, both parts of a settled fund. This fund fell in during the coverture, and the questions submitted were, (1) whether the value was to be taken then or at the marriage; (2) whether the two sums were to be taken separately; and (3) whether succession duty and costs should be deducted. Turner, L.J., would not decide either (2) or (3), but thought that although the titles were different, the funds coming at same time and under same instrument should be valued together; and as to the latter, that the right to such a deduction was a question of some nicety. Both he and Cairns, L.J., decided the case on the ground that in the covenant in question the value referred to was the value of the property in which W. had or might acquire an interest and not the value of her interest. No one can doubt that this is not what the framers of the covenant intended, the limit being thus rendered in many cases ineffectual for the obvious purpose of excludé small sums from the operation of the covenant. The result of the decision is that although property of the value of £399 given to W. absolutely would escape the settlement, an interest of £1 value given to her in any property of which the value (at the time of the settlement, or when the title accrues) exceeded £400 must be settled. It is difficult, however, to put any other construction upon the words "entitled to property of £—value for any interest." The words "of £—value" are evidently out of place, but even if they followed the word expectancy, the intention would not be effectually carried out, because then property much above the limit falling in soon after the determination of the coverture might be excluded, from the circumstance that during the coverture the reversionary interest of W. in it might have been, by reason of intervening interests, small. We leave it to our conveyancing readers to exercise their ingenuity in framing the requisite clause to meet these difficulties. There is also an element of vagueness in the use of the words from the same source, it not being clear whether properties coming to W. under the same instrument and at the same time, but through various titles, must all be taken together. It would seem, however, from the decisions, that the question is whether the properties accrue under the same title, and words to this effect will be understood if absent. Thus, in Re Hooper's Trust (11 Jur. N. S. 479, 13 W. R. 710), Vice-Chancellor Stuart held that a reversionary interest in stock and a legacy under the will of the tenant for life, though both accruing together, must be estimated separately, so that in the event one escaped the operation of the settlement, and in Re Middleton's Will (16 W. R. 1107) a similar decision was made by Vice-Chancellor Giffard as to a legacy to W. of a sum under the limit, and a share of residue taken by her under the same will for her separate use, and exceeding the limit.

That it is desirable to insert some limit in a covenant of this kind is shown by Fyfe v. Arbuthnot (5 W. R. 798, 1 D. & J. 406), where the blank after the £ had not been filled up. Lord Cranworth there considered that every capital sum not to be enjoyed as income would be bound.

The clause we are discussing concludes with the direction to hold the property on the trusts of the settlement. The only point to be attended to here is to define on which of the ultimate trusts it is to be held where, as is not unfrequently the case, the property of both H. and W. is included in the settlement, and these trusts differ. In Stevens v. Van Voorst, there being no issue, the question arose between the representatives of H. and W., and it was held that they must take in the same proportions in which they took the specified funds, the subject of the settlement.

It is sometimes desirable to add a clause authorising the trustees to allow the enjoyment in specie of leasehold and other interests of a terminable and wasting character, and in the form adopted by Mr. Prideaux the income of all interests depending on lives is directed to be treated as income, and so enjoyed.

We have intentionally omitted to notice the cases in which the clause in question is affected by recitals in the settlement, or by the facts that the later is post-nuptial, or that the wife was an infant at the date of the marriage, as the principles on which these cases rest are of a wide application, and could not conveniently be discussed with reference to those obligations alone which we have been just considering.

RECENT DECISIONS.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—IMPLIED WARRANTY OF AUTHORITY TO CONTRACT.

The Colonial Bank of Australasia v. Cherry and McDougall, P.C., 17 W. R. 1031.

A misrepresentation causing damage if made fraudulently gives a right of action for damages to the person to whom the misrepresentation has been made, and who has suffered damage therefrom. Without fraud (or what in law is treated as fraud) no such action can be maintained. Misrepresentation, damage, and fraud are all necessary ingredients to create the cause of action. There is, however, one exception to this rule. If a person contract as agent for another, believing himself fully authorised to do so, and it turns out that he was not so authorised, and the alleged principal refuses to be bound by the contract, the agent is liable to make compensation to the other party to the contract for the loss that may be caused by the failure of the contract. The agent is liable to an action on a warranty of his authority which is implied by law from the mere fact of his contracting as agent.

This was first established by Collen v. Wright (5 W. R. 265), where it was laid down that "a person who induces others to contract with him as agent is answerable to the person who so contracts for any damage he sustains by means of the assertion of the authority being untrue." This liability is, as we have said on the contract of warranty of authority, implied by law. If the agent fraudulently represent to another that he is authorised when he, in fact, is not authorised, and damage is caused thereby to that other person, the agent is then liable to an action of tort, called an action of deceit, as well as to an action on the implied warranty.

The principle of Collen v. Wright has subsequently been often followed and in The Colonial Bank &c. v. Cherry it is upheld by the Judicial Committee to its fullest extent, and, perhaps, even slightly extended.

The defendants, directors of a company, informed the plaintiffs that one Clarke had authority to draw cheques against the plaintiffs on behalf of the company. There was no fraud in the transaction, but in fact Clarke had not authority to draw cheques. Clarke drew cheques purporting to be on behalf of the company, who ultimately refused to be bound, and were not legally bound by such cheques. The jury found as a fact that the defendants had led the plaintiffs to believe that Clarke had authority to draw cheques. The Judicial Committee decided that under such circumstances "the law implied a warranty or undertaking on the part of the defendants that Clarke was duly authorised to draw the cheques," and that the defendants were therefore liable to the plaintiffs in an action on the implied contract of warranty.

The case perhaps goes a little further than Collen v. Wright, as there was no direct contract at all between the plaintiffs and defendants, but only a representation by the defendants without fraud that Clarke was a duly authorised agent.

HYPOTHECATION—BOTTOMRY BOND.

The Karnak, P. C., 17 W. R. 1028.

Hypothecation is a well-known contract by which a vessel, cargo, and freight may be pledged for the repayment of money advanced for the necessities of the vessel. This contract is usually made by what is called a bottomry bond, and hence the contract itself is frequently termed bottomry. The master of a vessel has an implied authority in cases of necessity to enter into a bottomry bond to supply the necessities of his vessel. He may hypothecate not only the vessel and freight, but also the cargo, the owners of the cargo having a right over against the shipowners to obtain re-payment of what they may have had to pay to the holder of the bottomry bond (Duncan v. Benson, 3 Ex. 644).

The Karnak has decided, or rather affirmed, two questions on the law of bottomry. Both points had been before decided, but the decision of the Judicial Committee gives, of course, increased weight to the former authorities. The first point was as to the nature of the necessity which authorises a master to hypothecate a cargo. The second as to the effect of hypothecation upon freight on which the charterer has already made advances.

On the first point the general rule laid down is that "the existence of the necessity which validates the hypothecation of cargo by bottomry is to be ascertained by evidence in the usual manner; and that the meaning of the term necessity in respect of hypothecation by the master is analogous to its meaning in other parts of the law. . . . It has been described as a high degree of need, a need which arises when choice is to be made of one of several alternatives under the peril of severe loss if a wrong choice should be made. . . . Any combination of events which would prevent the completion of the voyage with profit, unless money should be obtained by bottomry, would raise the question whether there was need for bottomry in such high degree as to create a necessity."

A bottomry bond, therefore, given to secure repayment of money advanced for the repairs of a vessel without any promise of any bond is not invalid if there are facts to show that the giving of the bond was really necessary, although the money had been already advanced.

As to the second point the charterer of the Karnak had made advances of freight which would, of course, be deducted from the amount of freight due from him when the freight was earned. The master properly hypothecated the freight. It was contended that the holder of the bottomry bond was entitled to the whole freight from the charterer without deducting the amount already advanced. It was held that this was not the law, and that the holder of the bond was only entitled to the freight to which the shipowners were entitled.

The judgment of the Judicial Committee puts an end to any doubt that may have before existed as to the law on these two points.

EQUITY.

IRREVOCABLE VOLUNTARY DEEDS.

Coutts v. Ackworth, V.C.M., 17 W. R. 1121.

The Vice-Chancellor laid down the rule that where a voluntary deed of gift is made, unless prepared by an independent solicitor, it is the duty of the solicitor to insist upon, and almost refuse to prepare such an instrument without a power of revocation. The presence or absence of such a power has, in fact, in more than one case been the chief ground of supporting or rejecting voluntary deeds. In Furshaw v. Welsby (9 W. R. 225) the Master of the Rolls said that it was the duty of a solicitor to see that a voluntary deed of gift by a man who was supposed to be lying in extremis should afford an opportunity to the settlor of revoking it in case he should recover his health; and if the settlor does recover he is entitled to ask that the deed may be delivered up to be cancelled, or that a proper power of revocation may be inserted in it. In that case the solicitor, who appeared in no respect to have acted personally improperly, was refused his costs, because the deed, which had been prepared in his office, contained no power of revocation. The cautious practitioner will leave the preparation of a voluntary deed whereby a client of his is to derive any benefit to some independent adviser. But if he does prepare the deed it is his duty to insert a power of revocation unless there be the clearest evidence that the intending settlor, with a full knowledge of the consequences of the omission, wishes the power to be omitted. It is not in human nature for any man to part with the control of his property during his life; and where a person is found to have done so by the execution of a voluntary irrevocable deed, the presumption that he did not know the full effect of the instrument executed by him is so strong, that the Court invariably throws the onus of showing that he knew what he was about on the parties taking an interest under the deed.

COMMON LAW.

FRAUD—CONTRACT—BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Foster v. Mackinnon, C.P., 17 W. R. 1105.

If a person is induced to enter into a contract by the fraud of the other party, the contract is voidable at the option of the person defrauded. He may as soon as the fraud is discovered treat the contract as a nullity or he may adopt the contract and compel its performance by the other party. This is an elementary principle of law, but it received a somewhat novel application in Foster v. Mackinnon. The action was by an indorsee of a bill of exchange against an indorser. Plea, traverse of the indorsement. It was found by the jury in effect that the defendant was induced, without negligence on his part, to write his name on the back of the bill by the fraudulent representation of the acceptor that the bill was a guarantee. The plaintiff was a bonâ fide holder for value without notice.

The Court decided that the defendant was not liable on the bill, on the ground that in contemplation of law he never did sign the contract to which his name was appended.

Such is the short point decided, but it is necessary to observe how carefully the principle of the decision is limited by the Court. It is restricted to cases where the contract signed is altogether different from the pretended contract. It is said that this case was as if the defendant "had written his name on a sheet of paper for the purpose of franking a letter, or in a lady's album or on an order for admission to the Temple Church, or on the leaf of a book, and there had been there without his knowledge a bill of exchange or promissory note to order inscribed on the other side of the paper."

If, however, the defendant had known that he was indorsing a bill of exchange when he wrote his name, then he would apparently have been liable to a bonâ fide holder for value without notice, even although the indorsement was procured by fraud.

The distinction between the two cases is that in the first the apparent indorser never intended to indorse a bill at all. In the second case he intended to indorse, but such intention was caused by fraud. In each case, as against the person guilty of the fraud, the indorsement is void. In the later case, however, the indorser is held liable to innocent third parties for the consequences of his indorsement. This liability would not of course affect any right of action the indorser might otherwise have against the person who fraudulently procured the indorsement.

It must also be noticed that the essence of this decision is that the defendant was not negligent. If the indorsement had been obtained in consequence of negligence on his part, he would have been liable upon the indorsement, even although he had, in fact, himself been deceived.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT, 1854 (17 & 1 VICT. c. 31), s. 7.

Zunz v. South-Eastern Railway Company, Q.B., 17 W. R. 1096.

Primâ facie a railway company, like any other company or an individual, has full powers to contract in any way it thinks proper. This right is, however, limited, by their liabilities as common carriers, which may sometimes affect the right to contract, and the right is still more restricted by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act. This statute enacts in effect that railway companies shall be liable for a negligent loss of, or injury to, goods carried by them, notwithstanding any contract to the contrary; provided only that the companies may make reasonable contracts with respect to the carriage, &c., of goods if such contracts are in a specified form.

The decision in Zunz v. South-Eastern Railway Company was that this statute "only applies to a line which the company against whom an action is brought either owns or is working." The plaintiff was a passenger by a through ticket of the defendants from London to Paris, and on his ticket there was a notice that the defendants would not be liable for any loss, injury, or detention of his luggage, except while in their trains or boats. The plaintiff's luggage was lost between Calais and Paris, and he brought an action to recover damages from the defendants, who relied on the terms of the conditions printed on the ticket. These conditions, even if reasonable, were not in the form required by the Act, as they were not signed by the plaintiff. The agreement was therefore invalid, if it was within the Railway and Canal Traffic Act. The Court decided that the Act "applies only to the lines which the companies have obtained by their Acts of Parliament or over which they have acquired running powers. It does not prevent them from being perfectly free to make any contracts they choose with regard to carriage on lines beyond their own."

This view of the question rendered it unnecessary to consider any other points, as the defendants were clearly not liable, unless their agreement was invalid.

Several questions were, however, raised in argument which are of importance now that long railway journeys by through tickets over many different lines are so frequent. One of these questions was whether the defendants' contract was to carry the plaintiff to Paris or only to carry him to Dover, with a further contract that they had authority to say that another company would carry him on. This point was not decided, but Cockburn, C.J., expressed a strong opinion that the contract was to carry the plaintiff from London to Paris. Another point raised and left undecided was whether the Railway and Canal Traffic Act applies at all to passengers' luggage. No opinion was expressed by the Court on this point.

Many questions of this kind yet remain to be decided as to the liabilities created by through tickets over lines of different companies. Zunz v. South-Eastern Railway Company has only decided one of them.

REVIEWS.

Shelford's Law of Railways. Containing the whole of the statute law for the regulation of railways in England, Scotland, and Ireland, with copious notes of decided cases upon the statutes, introduction to the law of railways, and appendix of official documents. Fourth edition. By W. CUNNINGHAM GLEN, Barrister-at-Law. In two volumes. London: Butterworths. 1869.

A work on the law of railways always means an arranged and annotated edition of the Railway Acts; and it would be almost impossible to treat the subject in any manner; the law of railways, being for the most part the direct creation of the Legislature, supplemented by the interpretations of the Courts of Law and Equity—unlike other branches, such, for instance, as the law of real property, which have had a gradual growth from the common law of England, though altered here and there by direct enactment.

In the present edition of the late Mr. Shelford's work the editor has collected every statute and document of public authority which can by any possibility be considered as bearing on the law of railways. The list of statutes embraces all statutes which bear even indirectly on the subject. Thus, besides the Lands Clauses Consolidation, Railway Regulation, and other Acts, which figure in all books on railways, we are given the Nitro-Glycerine Act and the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, on account of their enactments in respect of railway carriage; the Railway Clearing House Acts, the new Telegraphs Act, and all the railway and telegraph Acts of England, Ireland, and Scotland. The practitioner will find here collected together all the enactments bearing on every possible subject which may come before him in connection with railways or railway travelling. So thoroughly is this carried out that an Act having passed in 1850 for the transfer of the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, several sections of that Act are printed, because they affect the payment into court of moneys under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Similarly, several sections of the Larceny Act are printed, because they deal with fraud by bailees or the falsification of accounts by directors. Again, two sections of the Income Tax Act (23 Vict. c. 14) relate to railway profits and salaries, and these two sections are given. Indeed, some Acts are given which we should have thought it unnecessary to reprint. For instance, we should have thought that the Documentary Evidence Act of last session was too general in its application, and certainly no one could have complained had it been left out. We can hardly, however, say that this is a fault. Whatever questions may arise, the lawyer who has this book upon his shelves may say to himself,—"If there has been any legislation at all connected with this branch of the subject I shall at once find it in Shelford,"—and it needs not to be said that on this account the book will be a very "comfortable" one to possess. The collection is equally exhaustive in the matter of rules, orders, precedents, and documents of official authority. Thus the reader is given a model railway bill, bill of costs, the Stock Exchange rules as to the shares of public companies, Board of Trade model bye-laws, and scores of other things more or less useful. In some of these items, we must say, that we consider the volume as unnecessarily loaded. Who, for instance, is likely to consult the precedent of a "Notice of Postmaster-General to railway company to convey mails, &c." ? However, it is, as we said before, a very convenient thing to possess a work in which nothing whatever is omitted.

When we turn to the annotations we do not find the same completeness. To collect all the enactments, precedents, orders, &c., &c., is a far easier task than to arrange all the decisions in their proper places, as annotations. In this respect the collection is by no means so exhaustive. The Stock Exchange rules for instance are printed, but no mention whatever is made of the most important decisions in Grisell v. Bristowe (17 W. R. 123) and Coles v. Bristowe (17 W. R. 105), which have precisely the same relation to the Law of Railways as the Stock Exchange or wills have. We could multiply instances, but we will not. The annotations, too, are clumsily arranged. It is a very careless and inconvenient arrangement to discuss a point in three different parts of a volume, citing some of the authorities in one place and some in another. It seems almost incredible that any editor should be guilty of such a thing, yet, let us take an instance. Suppose we want to find some of the authorities bearing on the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to restrain applications to Parliament. In vol. II. there are three distinct portions dealing with that subject—viz., pp. 18, 535, and 791. At p. 18, Steele v. North Metropolitan Railway Company (15 W. R. 597) is the only authority given; the remaining cases are scattered between the two other references, and p. 13 is the only reference given in the index. There seems to be no system whatever about the references. To take another instance. In Attorney-General v. Ely, Haddenham, and Sutton Railway Company (16 W. R. 834) the Master of the Rolls gave a decision upon the 16th and 46th sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. This decision was confirmed by Lord Hatherley (17 W. R. 356) in somewhat different terms. At p. 548 (vol. II.) the Master of the Rolls' decision is given, the head note being taken from the Law Journal reports. At p. 599 (same vol.) the same decision is given again, the head note being taken this time from the Law Reports, and at p. 814 is noticed for the first time the Lord Chancellor's decision in the court above.

It is hardly necessary to say that this edition is very much larger than the preceding one. It contains a separate index and table of cases and contents for each volume, an arrangement which has both its advantages and its disadvantages. To sum up our review: as a collection of statutes and general information the work will prove extremely useful, because in these respects it is so perfectly exhaustive; but the notes are not well done.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

Nov. 9.—Re James Gray (a solicitor).

It will be remembered that certain charges of misconduct in a professional capacity brought against this gentleman by a client named Gingell were, in May last, investigated by the Incorporated Law Society before the Master of the Rolls, who made an order suspending Mr. Gray's certificate for a period of ten years (see 13 Sol. Jour. 637, 679). At the same time his Lordship expressed his willingness to reconsider the decision at any future time when Mr. Gray should have made reparation to his client for the wrong done to him.

With the object of enabling Mr. Gray to do this the drawing up of the order had been suspended from time to time on the application of counsel, Mr. Gray undertaking not to practise in the meantime, and this day

Sir Richard Bagge, Q.C. (Bardswell with him), stated to the Court that Mr. Gray had made the fullest reparation in his power, and asked his Lordship to reconsider his decision.

The Incorporated Law Society and Gingell did not oppose the application, and his Lordship directed the order not to be drawn up.

Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, Mr. Justice Morris, and Mr. Baron Hughes are the judges to try Irish election petitions for the ensuing year.

(Before Judge FLANAGAN.)

Nov. 8.—In the matter of the Estate of Philip Hastings, owner; Guinness and Mahon, petitioners.

Dames moved to make absolute a conditional order for the sale of the owner's estate. Guinness and Mahon had advanced to the owner's mother a sum of over £3,000, and the owner secured this debt by giving an equitable mortgage to the petitioners of his estates, and had actually written a letter admitting the debt, and acknowledging that he was security therefor.

Burke opposed the motion, on the grounds that, while admitting the debt and the security, he denied that that security would stand for a moment in a court of equity. This was a debt incurred by the owner's mother while he was a minor, and the security given by the owner was given within a year after the owner had reached twenty-one, and that it should therefore be looked on with suspicion. Counsel relied on the case of Archer v. Hudson, 7 Beav. 551, and other cases in 2 White & Tudor, 489.

His LORDSHIP considered that this young man had business habits, and he would not discharge the conditional order. The course he would, however, pursue was to allow the defendant to file a bill to set aside the equitable mortgage. If the Court of Chancery set it aside, the defendant would have to pay the costs of whatever steps were taken in this court.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. JOHN HASNEY BOYS, solicitor, of Margate, has been elected the first coroner for that borough under its separate jurisdiction. Mr. Boys' certificate as an attorney and notary was taken out in Michaelmas Term, 1837, and he is a perpetual commissioner, a commissioner to administer oaths, and a commissioner for taking affidavits both in the Common Law and Admiralty Courts.

MR. HERBERT TRITTON SANKEY, solicitor, of Margate, has been elected Clerk of the Peace for that borough, which was formerly incorporated with Dover, but has now a separate court of quarter sessions. The new clerk of the peace for Margate is a son of Mr. Robert Sankey, solicitor, and a partner in the legal firm of Sankey, Son, & Flint, which has also branches at Canterbury and London. Mr. H. T. Sankey was certificated as an attorney in Hilary Term, 1853.

MR. WILLIAM THOMAS BENSLEY, LL.D., solicitor, of Norwich, has been appointed Secretary to the Lord Bishop of Norwich, in the place of Mr. John Kitson, deceased. Mr. Bensley was educated at King's College, London, and in 1852 was elected an associate of that institution in the department of general literature and science. In 1854 he graduated B.A. at the university of London, and a few years ago received the degree of LL.D. He was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1858, and has practised at Norwich for some years.

MR. WILLIAM SUTTON PAGE, solicitor, of Guildhall-chambers, Norwich, has been appointed Clerk to the Commissioners of Income Tax for that city, in the place of Mr. R. Field, deceased. Mr. Page's certificate as a solicitor dates from Easter Term, 1862.

MR. JOHN ISAAC SOLOMON, Solicitor, of King-street, Cheapside, has been appointed a London Commissioner to administer oaths in chancery and common law.

MR. THOMAS JOHNSON MASON, Solicitor, of Louth, Lincoln, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the parts of Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln.

MR. CHRISTOPHER WILLIAM CATTELL, solicitor, of Bedford-row, London, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women in and for the county of Middlesex, the city and liberties of Westminster, and the city of London,

FOREIGN TRIBUNALS & JURISPRUDENCE.

AMERICA.

We take from the Chicago Legal Journal the following American decision on the new Marriage Law of 1861:—

Husband and wife, contracts between.

1. It is the rule of the common law that contracts between husband and wife are void, and will not be enforced by the courts.—Sweeney et al. v. Damon et al.

2. But where such contracts have been made in good faith, and are executed, they are valid.—Id.

3. So, where a husband has received money belonging to his wife, and invests it for her in her name, or has property bought with her money, conveyed to her, courts of equity will treat the transaction as fair, and sustain it against subsequent creditors of the husband chargeable with notice.—Id.

Property bought by husband.

4. And where, not being in debt, with a view of making provision for his wife, property is bought with his own means, and conveyed to her, or to trustees for her use, the transaction will be sustained.—Id.

When fraudulent.

5. If the husband is in debt, as to his creditors existing at the time of such transactions, they would be fraudulent, unless such creditors are satisfied subsequently.—Id.

Wife's means.

6. The wife may intrust means which she inherits since the Act of 1861 to her husband to loan or invest, and it will be protected in his hands to the same extent the money of a stranger would under like circumstances.—Id.

7. Converting equitable into legal estates.—Where the legal title to lands, purchased with the means of the wife, is in the husband, and he exchanges these lands for others, and has the deeds of the latter made to his wife, equity will uphold the title of the wife, as against creditors not misled by the title standing in the husband.—Id.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN WALKER, Q.C.

We have to announce the death of Mr. John Walker, Q.C., who expired after a long illness, on the 6th November at Little Heath, North Mymms, Herts. The late Mr. Walker was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn, in November, 1819, and was created a Queen's-counsel in 1842, being also elected a bencher of Lincoln's-inn. He was in his seventy-fifth year at the time of his death, and his name is familiar to the chancery practitioner as one of the editors of Jacob & Walker's Reports.

MR. H. A. EWER.

The death of Mr. Harry Alexander Ewer, solicitor, of Liverpool, took place at Wallasey, Cheshire, on the 6th November, in the fifty-third year of his age. Mr. Ewer took out his certificate as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1838, and was latterly a partner in the Liverpool firm of Wright, Ewer, & Wright; he was a member of the Liverpool Law Society, of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, and of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association. For several years Mr. Ewer held the appointment of Law Clerk to the Local Board of Wallasey, which becomes vacant by his death.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY OF LIVERPOOL.

The forty-third annual meeting of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool was held on Wednesday, Nov. 3, at the Law Association Rooms, Cook-street; Mr. John Yates, president of the society, in the chair. Amongst those present were Messrs. Hore (vice-president), Paget (honorary secretary), Bird (treasurer), T. Martin, H. L. Gregory, William Radcliffe, W. Pierce, G. Norris, Jevons, Squarey, Lowndes, Bellringer, Maddock, P. Wright, A. Wright, jun., Bartlett, Thornley, Payne, Frodsham, Avison, Thomas Martin, J. J. Yates, jun., Rowe, Riley, Fisher, J. Atkinson, French, J. H. E. Gill, C. Bretherton, J. B. Nelson, W. Barrett, and R. Biggs.

The report of the committee for the past year was then read:—

MEMBERS.

During the last year Messrs. James Thompson, William Dixon, A. C. Kent, G. T. Haigh, R. H. W. Biggs, J. B. Culshaw, William Francis, Christopher Moorhouse, John Parkinson, Hugh Quinn, and Walter Weld have become members of the society.

The society have to lament the loss of three members by death—namely, Mr. W. W. Driffield, Mr. Allan Kaye, and Mr. J. O. Watson. Mr. John North has resigned, having retired from the profession. Mr. J. H. Taylor and Mr. H. M. Taylor have also resigned, being about to leave Liverpool; and Mr. L. F. Peniston and Mr. G. T. Haigh have left Liverpool, and therefore ceased to be members. Mr. Boteler has resigned in consequence of ill health.

There are now 178 members.

LIBRARY.

The librarian reports that the circulation of books from the library, for the year, has gone on steadily increasing. The numbers are 5,796, against 5,348 in 1868.

INCORPORATION OF THE SOCIETY.

In accordance with the resolutions passed at the last annual meeting, the committee in the early part of the year took the necessary steps for obtaining the incorporation of the society, under section 23 of the Companies Act, 1867, and on the 13th day of February, 1869, the society was duly incorporated under the title of the "Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool." A common seal has been procured.

In accordance with the same resolutions, the old lease of the library is about to be surrendered, and a new lease granted to the society direct, without the intervention of trustees.

THE LEGISLATION OF THE SESSION.

Several important statutes relating to the administration of the law have been passed during the session, requiring notice by the committee, who acknowledge, with thanks, the valuable assistance which has always been given by the borough members on subjects brought before them by the committee.

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1869; DEBTORS ACT, 1869; BANKRUPTCY REPEAL ACT, 1869.

As these bills, though part of one scheme, were printed at considerable intervals of time, and separately discussed by the House of Commons, your committee were under the disadvantage of having to consider a general scheme with only a portion of it before them.

Notwithstanding the attention which was bestowed by the House of Commons upon the details of these bills, and the suggestions and assistance given by several lay members, amongst whom was Mr. Rathbone, one of the members for Liverpool, your committee are still of the opinion expressed in their observations printed last April—viz., that it would have been wise to refer the whole subject to a Royal Commission before legislation on so large a scale was attempted.

By far the most complete and best drawn Acts of Parliament of modern times for effecting great law reforms are the Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, the Chancery Amendment Act of 1852, and the Common Law Procedure Acts. These were all carefully prepared by draughtsmen upon the reports of royal commissions, underwent comparatively little alteration in their progress through Parliament, and have given rise to scarcely any litigation. On the other hand, the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 is notorious for the amount of litigation which it has caused, much of which it is only fair to observe was occasioned by the extensive alterations made in committee. Time will show whether the bankruptcy legislation of 1869 is well or ill advised.

Your committee regret the repeal of the Absconding Debtors Act, as there was probably no place where it was more used than in Liverpool. A debtor absconding say from an inland town was frequently discovered by his creditor to have come here, and to be about to embark for America or other distant shores. In many cases such debtors were arrested on warrants obtained from the Commissioner in Bankruptcy, or a county court judge, within an hour or two from the first receipt of instructions. Very many of such cases arise in a year, and it is little better than a mockery to tell the creditor his affidavit shall be sent up to London, and that the order to hold to bail will be down on the third day.

By the original bill a bankrupt was to be deemed guilty of misdemeanour for doing certain specified acts, "unless he proves that he did not do so with intent to defraud," and he was made competent, if he thought fit, to be sworn and give evidence upon his trial. The dangers of these great innovations in criminal law were pointed out by your committee in their observations, and the bill was altered in both particulars. The words "unless the jury is satisfied that he did not do so with intent to defraud" are substituted for the words quoted above, and the bankrupt is not made a competent witness. Several other defects pointed out in the observations have been more or less remedied.

The powers given to the Lord Chancellor, with the advice of the chief judge, to make rules of court are extraordinarily large, extending to any matters in respect to which it may be expedient to make rules for carrying into effect the objects of the Act, and "any rules so made shall be deemed to be within the powers conferred by this Act." The judicious exercise of these powers may do much to lessen the amount of litigation which we fear would otherwise ensue.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION COUNTY COURTS ACT.

A bill to enlarge the Admiralty Jurisdiction County Courts Act of last year was brought into the House of Commons by Mr. Norwood, Mr. Headlam, and Mr. Candlish. Your committee took exception to the bill on several points, and with the assistance of Mr. Graves, M.P., an unofficial interview took place at the Board of Trade between the vice-president and Secretary of the Board of Trade, the promoters of the bill, the Town Clerk of Liverpool, and a deputation from your committee. The result of a long discussion was that each clause, except the first, was abandoned by the promoters, who thereupon withdrew the bill, and shortly afterwards introduced another bill with the same title, but which in fact mainly consisted of the first clause of the old bill somewhat altered, and in this shape the bill has become law. Your committee regret that the effect of recent legislation has been to cast so large an amount of business of a very varied character upon the county courts, to an extent which, in the opinion of your committee, cannot be efficiently dealt with by those tribunals.

COMMON PLEAS OF LANCASTER ACT.

A bill to authorise the appointment of district prothonotaries was introduced early in the session by Mr. West, Q.C., the Attorney-General of the Duchy. The scheme is one which the society, in conjunction with the Manchester Law Association, have laboured for many years to carry out, and your committee, therefore, at once put themselves in communication with Mr. West, and enlisted the active support of the local members. The bill passed both Houses without serious opposition, and after it became law your committee, at the request of Mr. West, and in conjunction with the Manchester Law Association, gave their assistance in settling the rules and orders, in framing which great pains have been taken to make the court as useful as possible. In these rules permission is given, for the first time, to make use of the General Post-office in certain cases, both for the service of documents and for applications for summonses, &c.

The committee have much pleasure in reporting that Mr. Paget, the honorary secretary to the society, has, on a recommendation signed by very many of the members of the profession in Liverpool, been appointed by the Chancellor of the Duchy prothonotary for this district, and the committee feel assured the appointment will meet with general approval.

The committee have pleasure in adding that the district prothonotary has taken an office in the Law Association Buildings, 13, Harrington-street.

OTHER ACTS.

By the "Bails Act, 1869," those persons, whether attorneys or not, who hold commissions for taking common law affidavits in the country are enabled to take special bail, under 4 W. & M. c. 4, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and also recognizances of every kind, and all bail as well in error as otherwise on the revenue side of the Court of Exchequer. Until other fees are authorized by the Treasury, with the approbation of three judges, the fees are the same as are now payable under the Act of William and Mary, i.e., two shillings for each recognizance. But the abolition of the Absconding Debtors Act, and the alteration in the law of arrest on mesne process, made by section 6 of the Debtors Act, 1869, will render bailable proceedings less frequent than heretofore.

By the Act "to abolish the distinction as to priority of payment between the specialty and simple contract debts of deceased persons," a substantial law reform has been effected, and a further approach made to a fusion of law and equity. Nothing could be more calculated to bring English justice into disrepute with laymen than the different modes in which the effects of a deceased have been hitherto distributed by courts of equity, according as the assets happened to be legal or equitable. It was often difficult to say to which class particular assets belonged, and there was so little real principle in the distinction that a debtor, notwithstanding his insolvency could, by a few words in his will, convert legal into equitable assets, and thus completely alter the appropriation of his property. Many an estate has been brought into the Court of Chancery simply because the executors would not take upon themselves the responsibility of distributing the assets without a judicial decision as to whether they were legal or equitable. The Act applies to the estates of persons dying on or after 1st January, 1870.

By the Evidence Act, 1869, the last remaining restrictions on the evidence of parties in purely civil proceedings are swept away; the parties in a breach of promise case being made competent to give evidence. By section 3, parties, and the husbands and wives of parties, to proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery, are made competent, provided that no witness is to be asked a question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in such proceedings in disproof thereof.

ADMIRALTY DISTRICT REGISTRIES.

Your committee consider that the only really satisfactory mode of administering Admiralty law in Liverpool and the large out-ports will be by district registries of the High Court, and by a judge going circuit. This opinion stands recorded in last year's report, and the committee have the satisfaction of knowing that the same view is entertained by the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, who have issued a very able circular letter on the subject. In order to attempt to deal practically with this question, your committee prepared a draft bill, the principle of which was approved by the judge of the Admiralty Court; they then settled it, in conjunction with the committee of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, and the Liverpool Underwriters' Association, and with the three members for Liverpool. Having been settled by counsel, it was subsequently introduced by Mr. Graves, M.P., into the House of Commons, not with any hopes of its passing at that late period of the session, but in order to get the matter discussed, with a view to the bill being re-introduced next session. On the night fixed for the second reading (26th June), there was a "count out," and the bill fell through; but your committee hope that the attention, both of legal and mercantile bodies, having been called to the bill during the recess, it will be well supported in Parliament next session.

COUNTY COURTS ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION ACT, 1868.

Your committee assisted the assessor in framing general rules for the Court of Passage in its Admiralty jurisdiction, and also in settling a list of nautical assessors, but your committee regret that in consequence of the infrequency of the sittings of the Court, its Admiralty jurisdiction has been of necessity little resorted to. Some suggestions were also sent to Mr. Nicol of the Treasury upon the draft general orders for county courts under this Act.

REMUNERATION OF SOLICITORS.

At the request of Mr. Rathbone, M.P., your committee prepared a bill on this subject, which, after being modified in some respects in accordance with Mr. Rathbone's suggestions, was introduced by that gentleman, Mr. Morley, and Mr. George B. Gregory. The provisions of the bill are in the opinion of the committee calculated to confer great benefit upon the public and the profession. The bill, which was not printed until a few days before the recess, will doubtless be re-introduced next session, when your committee hope that it will be supported by both the profession and the public.

LOCAL JUDGES.

The appointment of Sir W. M. James to a Vice-Chancellorship of the High Court rendered the office of Vice-Chancellor of Lancashire vacant, and the appointment of Mr. Wickens to the latter office is highly satisfactory to the profession.

Some doubt existed whether the vacancy in the office of Commissioner in Bankruptcy, upon the death of Mr. Perry, would be filled up, having regard to the intended abolition of the Court by the Bankruptcy Bill which was then in progress and has since become law. Your committee thought it very desirable that some appointment should be made, as the total stoppage of business consequent upon there being no Commissioner was most inconvenient and prejudicial. They therefore addressed, through the president, a letter to the Lord Chancellor, who shortly afterwards appointed Mr. Thring to the vacant office, an appointment which has met with the cordial approval of the profession. Your committee have very recently addressed a memorial to the Lord Chancellor, requesting him to exercise the power reserved under the 130th section of the new Act, by continuing a registrar in office for twelve months from 1st January, 1870, in order to wind up pending bankruptcies, instead of allowing them to be transferred to the various county courts of the district.

CONCENTRATION OF LAW COURTS IN LONDON.

On the invitation of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, your committee took into consideration the question of the site of the Law Courts and offices in London. Your committee having come to a resolution in favour of the Carey-street site, published some observations on the subject, which were sent to the local members, and were also very extensively circulated by the London Society. Your committee are glad to find that the select committee of the House of Commons has come to the same conclusion, and they hope that no more time will be lost before commencing the erection of these much needed courts and offices.

CHANCERY OF LANCASHIRE AND COURT OF PASSAGE.

Your committee regret that the town council have not carried out their resolution of 7th October, 1868, to provide accommodation in the Town-hall for the registrars of both these courts. The attention of the Finance Committee has been frequently called to the subject, and on one occasion a deputation from your committee waited upon the Finance Committee and represented the importance of carrying the resolution into effect at once, the only immediate result of which has been that the registry of the Court of Passage has been removed into the spacious rooms at the Town-hall, lately occupied by the Town Clerk and his staff, but this arrangement is understood to be only temporary.

SITE OF LIVERPOOL COUNTY COURT.

The more the jurisdiction and business of the county court are extended the greater is the inconvenience to the profession, from its situation in Lime-street, and from its want of sufficient accommodation. Negotiations between the Treasury and the borough authorities for the purchase of a new site in Victoria-street unfortunately miscarried, but your committee have passed a resolution to the effect that it is expedient that the Court should be moved nearer to the centre of business, and that Victoria-street and the streets adjoining offer some eligible sites, and this resolution has been forwarded to the county court judges and also to the Treasury.

CLERKSHIP TO JUSTICES.

The clerkship to the borough magistrates having become vacant through the resignation of Mr. Wybergh, the society at a special meeting took the opportunity of recording their opinion that the office ought to be filled by an attorney.

ATTORNEYS AS MAGISTRATES.

Your committee rejoice that the stigma which so long attached to practising attorneys, namely, that they were considered unfit to be put on the Commission of the Peace, has been removed as regards boroughs in this county. Three practising attorneys, all members of this society, have been placed on the commission for Liverpool since the last annual report,—one of them, Mr. Edward Whitley, by the Chancellor of the Duchy under the late Government, and the other two, Mr. Clarke Aspinall and Mr. P. F. Garnett, by the present Chancellor.

MATTERS RELATING TO ATTORNEYS.

A rule in re striking the name of a Liverpool attorney off the rolls has been obtained since the last report by the Law Society of the United Kingdom, upon evidence obtained through your committee.

Another case of grave misconduct by a Liverpool solicitor having been brought to the attention of your committee since this society was incorporated, your committee thought proper, acting under the advice of counsel, to petition the Court of Chancery in the name of the society, and the Court made an order suspending the solicitor from practising for ten years.

TIMPRON MARTIN AND ATKINSON PRIZES.

The council of the Law Society of the United Kingdom reported last Michaelmas Term that the examiners had certified that there was no candidate from Liverpool or Preston in the year 1868 who was in their opinion entitled to honorary distinction, and that the gold medals of Mr. Martin and Mr. Atkinson had been withheld.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report, stated that during the last session of Parliament a great many measures had been considered to some extent affecting the legal profession, and, undoubtedly, seriously affecting the interests of the community. In reference to the Bankruptcy, the Debtors, and the Bankruptcy Repeal Acts of 1869, the committee had arrived unanimously at the conclusion that the existing state of the law was such that any alteration must almost of necessity be an amendment. Many of the alterations were of great importance, and some of them the committee had criticised with considerable severity. Various suggestions were made by the committee; and whilst some of them had been rejected, others had been introduced into the bills, and passed into law. Having detailed the proceedings taken by the committee in reference to the Admiralty Jurisdiction County Courts Act, the president observed that they objected to the bill on the ground that the county courts were not adapted or, at all events, they were so much occupied by other business that it was not desirable their practice in the direction of Admiralty cases should be extended; and whilst not objecting to the contents of the bill itself, they thought a better tribunal might have been established. The Common Pleas of Lancaster Act, they were glad to have the opportunity of saying, had become law, mainly through the exertions of Mr. West, the Attorney-General of the Duchy, and was likely to prove a great boon to the profession at large and to the public. In a few days the Act would come into active operation and the court would be one similar in jurisdiction to a certain extent, and in action entirely, to the Superior Courts of Law at Westminster. He felt great personal gratification that he had the honour to be the president of the society at a time when one of the most substantial boons to the profession in this county had been conceded; and he hoped they would avail themselves of it, and show their appreciation of what the committee had obtained for them. When the bill was on the verge of passing, being apprehensive that the prothonotary might be made a mere political appointment, and that, as had happened before, a gentleman who would not be acceptable to the profession might be thrust upon them, to the injury of both the profession and suitors, a deputation went to Lord Dufferin and urged upon his lordship the vast importance of appointing some one who would be acceptable to the profession. The deputation had every reason to be grateful to his lordship for the way in which they were then treated, and still more so for the substantial result which had followed from the interview. On the return home of the deputation it was suggested that Mr. T. E. Paget, the honorary secretary of that society, would suit the office very well, and a recommendation from the profession at large in Liverpool, that the appointment of that gentleman would be very acceptable to them, was thereupon transmitted to Lord Dufferin. Lord Dufferin had appointed their excellent friend Mr. Paget, and in the course of a few days the court would be opened. The president then referred at length to the question of Admiralty district registries, expressing his conviction that as one-third of the Admiralty business of the kingdom went from Liverpool there was ample scope for a registry here. He thought, also, that the county court was not a proper court to have Admiralty jurisdiction; and regretted that the Assessor of the Court of Passage, instead of holding six or seven sittings, would only consent to hold five annually, and that, too, for a large increase of salary. The only way of solving the difficulty was by establishing a district registry, and the committee, with the assistance of others, had already laid the basis for legislation to that end. In conclusion, the president said the committee had attended most sedulously and industriously during the past year, and he hoped their labours would tend to the benefit of the whole community.

Mr. M. J. HORE, vice-president, said he had very great pleasure in seconding the adoption of the report.—Carried unanimously.

On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. A. T. Squarey, the treasurer's statement for the past year was unanimously approved.

Mr. TIMPRON MARTIN then moved, "That the cordial thanks of the society be presented to the officers and committee for their services during the past year, and that the members regret that they will lose the able services of Mr. Paget, the hon. secretary. At the same time they congratulate him upon his appointment as District Prothonotary of the Common Pleas at Lancaster." From the internal evidence of the report, it appeared that the labours of the committee during the past year had been of a very onerous character, and he thought they would all agree with him that the thanks of the society were eminently due to the president and his colleagues on the committee. (Hear, hear.) The president had very properly and very feelingly referred to the services of Mr. Paget, and he was sure they all felt gratified at that gentleman's appointment to the position he was so shortly about to fill.—The motion was carried by acclamation.

The PRESIDENT, in acknowledging the vote, said he felt very much indebted to all those with whom he had been associated during his year of office for their kindness to him, and he could bear his personal testimony to the ready zeal and vigorous action of every member of the committee. It was a high source of gratification to him to feel that he had gained and kept the respect of his professional brethren.

Mr. M. J. HORE, vice-president, acknowledged the compliment.

Mr. T. E. PAGET, who was received with general applause, said the society, by the vote which they had just passed, had added one more to the many favours which he had received at the hands of his professional brethren in this town. He had already had an opportunity of thanking those gentlemen whom he was most frequently in the habit of meeting round the table at the board-room, for the hearty way in which they came forward to assist him to obtain the office; and he could assure them that if it had not been that members of the profession and of that society urged him, in the first instance, to apply for the appointment, he should never have dreamed of doing so. Thanks, however, to the hearty support he had met with from the profession, the office of district prothonotary had been conferred upon him. He would assure them that the duties of the office appeared so important, and the powers attached to it so great, that he should have hesitated in accepting the post had he not felt confident of the kind consideration of the profession being extended towards him while he held it. After stating that he had been so fortunate as to secure the services of Mr. Hodges, who had been for many years in the Court of Passage, to assist him in his court, and expressing his obligations to his friend Mr. Fleet for many kind and most valuable suggestions, Mr. Paget briefly alluded to the arrangements of his new office. He then bore his testimony to the earnest way in which the committee had discharged their duties during the past two years, and said as long as they could get gentlemen in the foremost ranks of the profession to devote their most valuable time, and give the benefit of their experience to the management of the affairs of the society, so long they would not want an efficient secretary to do the ordinary routine work, and to assist them in extending and widening the influence which the society now possessed.

Mr. TIMPRON MARTIN moved, "That the strongest representations be made to the Lord Chancellor of the necessity for keeping open the Court of Bankruptcy for the Liverpool district for at least twelve months from the 1st of January next; and that it will be most inexpedient that the proceedings in the several bankruptcies then subject to the jurisdiction of that court, or the books and papers relating thereto, should be deposited in London." He believed that at present it was not the intention of the Lord Chancellor to order what the resolution suggested, but that arrangements would be made for transmitting to London the files of the bankruptcy estates; and as that course in the case of current estates would be a most inconvenient proceeding, he trusted the resolution would be passed.

Mr. F. D. LOWNDES said he had great pleasure in seconding the resolution, but he must state that he could hardly credit the rumour which had been referred to. It would be such an act of transparent folly to take the papers from Liverpool to London, where they would be next door to useless, that he was quite sure, if the matter were represented to the Lord Chancellor, and to the chief judge of the Court of Bankruptcy, they would see the inadvisability of pursuing such a course.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The society then proceeded to the election of seven members of the committee, when the following gentlemen were chosen:—Messrs. Hore, Bird, and Gill, re-elected; and Messrs. Albert Wright, J. O. Jones, J. E. Gray-hill, and Timpron Martin, new members.

Mr. R. A. Payne said he wished to inform the society that at the meeting of the Metropolitan Law Association, held at York lately, it was the unanimous opinion of those present that it would not be improper for any professional man to accept, under the new bankruptcy law, the office of trustee, and to receive his fees, not as quasi attorney, but as quasi trustee.

Mr. Peter Wright, as one of the oldest members of the profession in this town, moved a vote of thanks to the president for his conduct in the chair, and said he was proud to see Mr. Yates filling such a position as that of the head of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool.

Mr. THOMAS AVISON seconded the motion, which was carried by acclamation.

The PRESIDENT having acknowledged the compliment the proceedings ended.

We understand that since the annual meeting Mr. Maurice John Hore (late Vice-President) has been elected President, and Mr. J. H. E. Gill, Vice-President, of the society; and that Mr. E. W. Bird has been re-elected Treasurer, and Mr. A. T. Wright has been elected Secretary.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the society, held on Tuesday, 9th November instant, Mr. E. C. Harvie, in the chair, the following question was discussed:—"Legal mortgage to M. Building Society; second mortgage to A. without notice of first. L. Building Society, without notice of second mortgage, pay off M. Society, get the title-deeds, procure receipt under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 5, to be endorsed on first mortgage, and obtain mortgagor's execution of a mortgage to them to secure amount paid to M. Society. Are L. Society entitled to priority over A. for amount paid by them?" The debate was opened by Mr. Butterworth in the affirmative, and after an interesting discussion the question was decided in the negative by a majority of two. The number of members present was twenty-three. Two new members were elected, and two gentlemen proposed as members.

The Bookseller may be described as the organ of the book-world of England. It contains complete lists of all new and standard works; it reveals the operations of the whole publishing trade every month; and it is, moreover, enriched by short articles of intelligence, interesting and valuable to all readers and lovers of books, and careful little notices of new works of importance.—The Home News.

OUR ANCESTORS AS LEGISLATORS.—Upwards of two centuries since the following, amongst other Standing Orders, were printed, the first bearing date May 17, 1614:—"Ordered,—That this House shall sit every day at seven o'clock in the morning, and enter into the great business at eight, and no new motion to be made after twelve. Ordered,—That so soon as the clock strikes twelve Mr. Speaker do go out of the chair, and the House shall rise; and that, in going forth, no member shall stir until Mr. Speaker do go before, and then all the rest shall follow. Whosoever shall go out of the House before Mr. Speaker shall forfeit ten shillings, but that the reporters may go first. Ordered,—That no member of the long robe do presume to plead any cause at the bar of the House of Lords without leave." In 1693 it was "Ordered,—That no member of the House do presume to smoke tobacco in the gallery, or at the table of the House, sitting at committees."

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Michaelmas Term, 1869.

The intermediate and final examination of candidates took place on the 9th, 10th, and 11th inst., at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, London.

The examiners were the Master Bennett, of the Court of Common Pleas, Mr. A. W. White, Mr. F. T. Bircham, Mr. John Young, Mr. J. M. Clabon, and Mr. R. B. Upton.

QUESTIONS.

I.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. Can an oral agreement to hire a servant for one year, to commence a week after making the agreement, be enforced? and give the reason for your answer.
2. By, and against whom, should actions be brought to recover debts owing to or contracted by a married woman before her coverture; and what is the effect of the death of the wife, as regards the rights and liabilities respectively of the husband with reference to such debts?
3. Who is the party primarily liable on a bill of exchange, and to what other party or parties should notice of dishonour be given?
4. What are the principal provisions of the summary procedure on Bills of Exchange Act?
5. Can the administrator of a sole executor, who dies intestate, sue for a debt due to the executor's testator; and if not, what should be done to clothe some person with power to sue? Would the case be different if there were an executor of the deceased executor?
6. State generally under what circumstances a master is, or is not, liable for the acts of his servant?
7. Is parol evidence admissible to alter or explain the effect of a written agreement under any, and, if any, what circumstances?
8. State the circumstances under which oral, or other secondary evidence of the contents of a written instrument can, or cannot, be given in a trial?
9. What is long, and what short notice of trial, and what is a sufficient countermand of notice of trial?
10. What step should be taken on the part of the plaintiff, when the defendant keeps out of the way, and avoids service of a writ of summons?
11. What is an interpleader; what the course of proceeding in an interpleader; and what is the most usual occasion for its adoption?
12. For what period does a writ of summons remain in force, and what step should be taken to keep it in force, if it cannot be served within such period?
13. What is a distress; and how is a distress for rent made?
14. What is an action of replevin?
15. Describe shortly the several usual proceedings in an ordinary action at law, to recover the price of goods sold.

II.—CONVEYANCING.

1. What is an estate of inheritance?
2. Give the usual form of limitations by which an estate can be settled by deed on A. B. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male.
3. A. B. dies intestate, leaving a widow and three children surviving him; in what proportions is his personal estate distributable between them?
4. If you were selling, in several lots, an estate held under one set of title deeds, what arrangement should you make in the conditions of sale with reference to the future custody and inspection of such title deeds?
5. What is the difference between a legal and an equitable estate in real property? Give an example.
6. Does the receipt of rent by a landlord, after notice of a breach of covenant by his tenant, amount to a waiver of the right of re-entry?
7. What are the essentials to a valid execution of a will under 1 Vict. c. 26?
8. Can a husband dispose of his wife's reversionary chose in action against her will?
9. Can the trustees of an ordinary power of sale sell the surface of lands, reserving the minerals, when the power contains no express authority to that effect?
10. When was the Succession Duty Act passed, and how does it affect the title to real property?

11. What is the mode of barring entails in copyholds since the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74?

12. If a mortgagor desires to pay off a mortgage, must he give any, and what, notice to the mortgagee?

13. By what means can the freehold estates of a married woman be now conveyed?

14. What length of adverse possession will create a good title to lands; and does it make any, and what, difference, if the original owner was a minor when the adverse possession commenced?

15. A. B. makes a voluntary settlement of his lands on his children, and subsequently sells and conveys the same lands to a purchaser for valuable consideration, the purchaser having full notice of the voluntary settlement. Will the purchaser hold the lands free from the trusts of the voluntary settlement?

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. Name some of the principal classes of cases in which courts of equity exercise jurisdiction.
2. Recapitulate some of the general maxims of equity, and give the meaning of each.
3. Is there any, and what, distinction in the action of Courts of Equity when invited to relieve against mistake in matter of fact and mistake in matter of law?
4. Define constructive fraud, and instance cases coming within it. How do Courts of equity regard such cases, and what jurisdiction do they exercise respecting them?
5. Define an express trust—an implied trust—a resulting trust—a constructive trust—and give an instance of circumstances under which a constructive trust would be considered as arisen.
6. Equity forbids parties standing in certain relations from becoming purchasers of, or acquiring interests beneficial to themselves in the property respecting which those relations exist. Mention some of the relations in respect of which this prohibition operates, and state on what principle it rests? And how you would get a case deserving such exception excepted from the operation of the general rule?
7. Letters passing between a proposing vendor and purchaser may, in one case, operate as a binding agreement of sale and purchase, and in another case, may not do so. Illustrate this position by instancing what letters must contain in order to operate to the former extent, and by what omission, &c., they may fall short of it.
8. Explain the difference between legal and equitable assets, and state the order in which assets for the payment of debts are administered under a decree.
9. Explain what is meant by the marshalling of assets. Give an example.
10. A., B., and C., have successively mortgages of the same property, A. having the legal estate. Subsequently C. takes a transfer of A.'s security, including the legal estate. Then B. seeks to redeem the first mortgage only. Will a Court of equity in any, and what, case aid him, and in any, and what, case decline?
11. What is meant by marshalling of securities. Give an example.
12. Explain the doctrine of election, and give an instance of its operation.
13. A female infant possessed of reversionary personality, is about to be married, and a settlement of such personality in contemplation of the proposed marriage is desired; can, and will a Court of equity aid in affecting a valid settlement? and what constitutes the peculiarity of the case?
14. Enumerate the several modes of commencing proceedings in chancery, and instance a case to which each respective mode is applicable.
15. Enumerate the several modes of defending a suit in chancery, and instance the circumstances in which each respective mode is applicable.

IV.—BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. What are the requisites necessary to obtain an adjudication of bankruptcy against a trader at the instance of a creditor?
2. State the acts of bankruptcy which may be committed by a trader, and those which may be committed by a non-trader.
3. Can a debtor obtain adjudication against himself, and if so, how?
4. Give some account of the judgment debtor summons, and how adjudication can be obtained thereunder, and the like as to trader debtor summons.

5. How are debts proved in bankruptcy; and must the debt be due in respect of which the proof is sought to be made, whether the consideration be a running bill of exchange, or goods sold upon credit which has not yet expired?

6. What are the remedies as to right of proof for sureties and persons liable for the debts of a bankrupt?

7. What remedy has the obligee in a bottomry or respondentia bond, or the assured in any policy of assurance, against the bankrupt's estate?

8. Is an annuity creditor entitled to prove, and if so, how is the amount of his proof ascertained?

9. Are the rights and remedies of a mortgagee affected if the mortgagor become bankrupt, and if so, how?

10. Give some account of the doctrine of order and disposition.

11. How can a bankrupt obtain his order of discharge, and what is the effect thereof when obtained?

12. State some grounds of objection to the bankrupt obtaining his order of discharge.

13. State some of the offences in respect whereof a bankrupt may be indicted.

14. How is the change effected from bankruptcy to arrangement—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 185, et seq.?

15. State what are the requisites in trust deeds for the benefit of creditors, composition, and inspectorship deeds, executed by a debtor—s. 192, et seq.

V. CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

1. Into what classes may criminal offences be divided? and give a general description of each.

2. Mention the principal courts of criminal jurisdiction in England.

3. To which of the superior courts is the jurisdiction over crimes and misdemeanours confined, and by what different proceedings is the jurisdiction chiefly put in motion?

4. What is the nature and jurisdiction of the Court of Quarter Sessions, and how many justices must be present to hold a court?

5. What is the Court of Petty Sessions? State its nature, jurisdiction, and mode of proceeding.

6. When a person accused of any criminal offence is arrested, what course should be pursued to bring him to trial.

7. For what length of time may a prisoner be remanded before a magistrate?

8. Define the crime of larceny.

9. Is it any, and what, offence to destroy a will in the testator's life time.

10. Is it felony or misdemeanour (state which) to cancel, or obliterate the title deeds of another man's land, and, if so, under what statute?

11. Is a bailee converting goods to his own use guilty of larceny?

12. Define the offence of forgery.

13. Will the alteration of a genuine instrument amount to forgery, and if so, under what circumstances?

14. If a man draw a bill of exchange on a fictitious person, and accept the bill in the name of such person, is that an offence, and if so, of what character?

15. What are the principal recent statutes as to the consolidation and amendment of the criminal law?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS AT THE FINAL EXAMINATION FOR MICHAELMAS TERM, 1869.

I.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By E. A. C. SCHALCH, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. No. It cannot be enforced, because the 5th clause of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds enacts that no action shall be brought "upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof," unless the agreement be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by his agent.

2. Actions for debts owing to, or contracted by, a married woman before coverture, must be brought by or against the husband and wife jointly. By the death of the wife the husband's rights as regards such debts vest in him alone as administrator of his wife. His liability to such debts ceases except to the extent of the property to which he becomes entitled as his wife's administrator.

3. The party primarily liable upon a complete bill of exchange is the acceptor. Notice of dishonour must be given by the holder to all prior endorers and the drawer, if the holder wish to hold them liable.

4. The Act is 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67. It enables a plaintiff suing on a bill of exchange, promissory note, or cheque, within six months of the time within which it has become due, to obtain a writ in a special form, warning the defendant that unless within twelve days he obtains leave to appear and defend the action, and does appear and defend, judgment may be signed against him. This writ is endorsed with a copy of the bill, &c., sued upon. Leave may be obtained at judges' chambers by the defendant to appear and defend, if he shows by affidavit that he has a defence to the action, or if he pays as security into court the amount claimed. The expenses of noting a bill may be recovered in the action. There are some other provisions in the Act of minor importance. The chief peculiarity of the procedure is that the defendant has to obtain leave to appear and defend. Unless he does so judgment may be signed against him. In other cases the defendant has a right to appear without any leave.

5. No. The representation of the executor's testator is not continued by the executor's administrator. In order to sue for the debt administration to the testator's estate de bonis non must be obtained. The executor's administrator might, of course, also become the administrator of the testator, but a separate administration must be obtained. The executor's executor would continue the representation of the testator, and in that case no administration to the testator need be taken out; and such executor's executor could sue for a debt due to the testator.

6. Prima facie one person is not liable for the acts of another. A master may, however, be liable for the torts of his servant if they are committed by the servant in the execution of the master's business, and in the ordinary course of the servant's employment. This liability depends upon the maxim respondet superior, and exists where the wrongful act has not been authorised by the master. If the wrongful act is authorised by the master, then it is the master's act as much as if it had been done by his hand, and his liability does not depend upon the relation of master and servant as in the former case, but upon the rule of law qui facit per alium facit per se. A master is liable for the contracts of his servant only when he has expressly or impliedly authorised them.

7. Generally parol evidence is not admissible to alter or explain the effect of a written agreement. It may, however, be admitted—(1) to show fraud; (2) to show that the writing was subject to a condition precedent; (3) to explain the meaning of words, as if the agreement is in a foreign language, or in technical terms, or in cypher, or in language that has a special meaning by virtue of some usage of trade. Parol evidence is also admissible to add incidents to agreements when not contradicting the written terms if by usage such incidents are understood always to form part of such agreements; (4) to show the character in which a party has contracted, as if an agent or a surety. There are, besides, two or three other cases in which courts of equity admit verbal evidence to vary written contracts.

8. Generally oral evidence of the contents of a written document cannot be given. The exceptions to the rule are—(1) when the document is destroyed or lost; (2) when its production is physically impossible or highly inconvenient; (3) when the document is in the possession of the adverse party who, after notice, refuses to produce it; (4) when it is in the hands of a third party who is not compellable by law to produce it, and who, being called as a witness upon a subpoena duces tecum, relies upon his right to withhold it; (5) when the law raises a strong presumption in favour of the existence of the document; (6) when the papers are voluminous; (7) when the question arises upon the examination of a witness on the voir dire.

9. Ten days is a long, and four days a short, notice of trial. By section 98 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, "a countermand of notice of trial shall be given four days before the time mentioned in the notice of trial, unless short notice of trial has been given, and then two days before the time mentioned in the notice of trial, unless otherwise ordered by the Court or judge, or by consent."

10. The plaintiff should proceed under section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, by which the service of a writ of summons shall be personal where practicable, "but it shall be lawful for the plaintiff to apply from time to time, on affidavit, to the court out of which the writ issues, or to a judge, and in case it shall appear to such Court or judge that reasonable efforts have been made to effect personal service, and either that the writ has come to the knowledge of the defendant, or that he wilfully evades service of the same, and has not appeared, it shall be lawful for such Court or judge to order that the plaintiff be at liberty to proceed as if personal service had been effected."

11. An interpleader is a suit between two persons who claim property in the hands of a third person who claims no interest himself in such property. When rival claims by two persons are made on such third person, he can, after one of the claimants has commenced an action against him, obtain a judge's order calling on the two claimants to interplead—i.e., to try between themselves the question which of them is entitled to the property. This question most frequently arises when goods seized in execution are claimed by some person who alleges that he, and not the judgment-debtor, is entitled to them. The sheriff, who, of course, has no interest himself in the goods, then can require the judgment-creditor and the claimant of the goods to interplead.

12. An ordinary writ of summons remains in force for six months. Writs can be renewed at any time while they remain in force for a further period of six months by being marked with a seal under section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

13. A distress for rent service (there are other kinds of distress) is a seizure by a lessor of goods on land demised to obtain payment of rent due for such land. A distress is made by the seizure by the landlord or his agent of the goods on the demised land. If the tenant does not pay the rent, the goods seized may be sold, but the formalities required by 2 W. & M. ss. 1, c. 5, must be observed. The goods may be sold after five days notice, and after a proper appraisement as therein provided, and for the best price. The surplus, if any, after the sale of the distress, ought to be left in the hands of the sheriff. On payment of the rent and expenses the tenant is entitled to have the distrained goods returned to him.

14. An action of replevin is an action to recover goods distrained. A tenant whose goods have been distrained can obtain from the registrar of the county court a re-delivery of the goods distrained upon giving security that the tenant will commence and prosecute an action against the distrainer for a wrongful distress. The chief peculiarity of the action is that the plaintiff can obtain possession of goods alleged to be wrongfully taken before the action for such alleged wrongful taking is commenced. The object of the action is to test the legality of the distress.

15. The plaintiff commences by issuing a writ which ought to be specially indorsed with the amount and particulars of the plaintiff's claim. The defendant appears. The plaintiff declares, the defendant pleads, and the plaintiff joins issue. The cause then goes to trial, and if the plaintiff obtain a verdict he can sign judgment, and is then entitled to issue execution for the amount thereof unless the defendant pays it. If there is a demurrer in the pleadings it has to be decided by the Court in banc.

II.—CONVEYANCING.

(By H. N. MOZLEY, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. An estate of inheritance is an estate which is limited to a man and his heirs, or to a man and the heirs of his body.

2. "Unto and to the use of the said A. B. and his assigns for his life, without impeachment of waste, and from and after the decease of the said A. B. to the use of the first and every other son of the said A. B. successively, according to their respective seniorities, and the heirs male of their respective bodies."

3. The widow of A. B. will take one-third of his estate, and the three children will take the remaining two-thirds in equal shares. Thus the children will take each two-ninths of A. B.'s estate.

4. The arrangement to be made will appear from the following form given in Davidson, 2nd ed. vol. 1 p. 560:—

"The purchaser of the largest part in value of property held by the same title shall be entitled, after the completion of the sale of all such property, to the custody of the muniments of title composing the same, and shall enter into the usual covenants with the purchasers of the other parts of the same property for the production and furnishing copies of such muniments, such covenants to be prepared by and at the expense of the purchasers requiring the same. If any part of such property shall not be sold at this sale, the vendor shall retain the said muniments until all such property shall be sold, and the purchasers of the lots sold shall in the meantime be entitled, at their own expense, to the production of such muniments, and to copies of them, but not to a covenant for that purpose. The vendor will retain such muniments of title as relate to any of the property offered for sale, and also to other property not included in the sale, and will enter into the usual covenants with the purchasers for the production and furnishing copies thereof, such covenants to be prepared by and at the expense of the purchasers requiring the same, and to be made determinable on the vendor parting with the same muniments, and procuring (without expense to the purchasers) the person or persons to whom the same shall be delivered to enter into similar covenants with the purchasers or the persons for the time being entitled to the benefit of the vendor's covenants."

5. A legal estate in real property is an estate to which the owner is entitled in contemplation of a court of law, as distinguished from equity. An equitable estate is an estate to which the owner is entitled in contemplation of the Court of Chancery which administers equity.

Thus where land is vested in A. in trust for B., A., the trustee, has the legal estate, which he can maintain in a court of law; and he is accordingly entitled to receive the rents and profits; but B., the cestui que trust, is able, by virtue of his estate in equity, to oblige his trustee to come to an account, and hand over the whole of the proceeds.

6. The receipt of rent by a landlord after notice of breach of covenant by his tenant does in general amount to a waiver of the right of re-entry, assuming that the lease provides that upon breach of the condition it shall be lawful for the lessor to re-enter, and not that the lease shall cease, determine, and become utterly void and of no effect. It was observed by Lord Mansfield, in Goodright v. Davids (Cowper, 803)—"To construe this acceptance of rent, due since the condition broken, a waiver of the forfeiture is to construe it according to the intention of the parties. Upon breach of the condition the landlord had a right to enter. He had full notice of the breach, and does not take advantage of it; but accepts rent subsequently accrued. That shows he meant the lease should continue. Cases of forfeiture are not favoured in law, and where the forfeiture is once waived the Court will not assist it." (See Smith's Landlord and Tenant, 140—150, and cases there cited.)

7. The essentials to the valid execution of a will under the 1 Vict. c. 26, are that it shall be in writing, and signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator, in the presence of two or more witnesses, present at the same time; and such witnesses shall attest, and shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator.

8. A husband cannot dispose of his wife's reversionary chose in action against her will, so as to deprive her of the enjoyment of it in the event of the marriage being dissolved in her lifetime, whether by divorce or death of the husband.

9. It was decided in Buckley v. Howell (29 Beav. 546) that the ordinary power of sale and exchange contained in settlements does not authorise the trustees to sell the lands with a reservation of the minerals. But now, by statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 108, it is provided that every trustee and other person authorised to dispose of land by way of sale, exchange, partition, or enfranchisement, may, with the sanction of the Court of Chancery, to be obtained on petition in a summary way, dispose of the land without the minerals, or of the minerals without the land, unless forbidden so to do by the instrument creating the trust or power (Williams on Real Property, 8th ed. p. 298).

10. The Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51) was passed in the year 1853. By section 42 it is provided that the duty imposed by the Act shall be a first charge on the interest of the successor, and of all persons claiming in his right, in all the real property in respect whereof such duty shall be assessed.

11. By section 50 of the Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Will. 4 c. 74) all the previous clauses in the Act, so far as the circumstances and the different tenures admit, apply to lands held by copy of court roll, except that a disposition by a tenant in tail whose estate is an estate at law, must be made by surrender, and except that a disposition by a tenant in tail whose estate is merely an estate in equity, may be made either by a surrender or by a deed, and except so far as such clauses are otherwise altered or varied by the clauses which follow.

Sections 51 and 52 have reference to the protector's consent; section 53 to equitable estates tail in copyholds.

By section 54, the surrender or the memorandums or a copy thereof, or the deed of disposition, or the deed of consent to the disposition, need not be enrolled otherwise than by entry on the court rolls.

A disentailing deed of copyholds must be entered on the court rolls within six months after the execution thereof; otherwise it will have no operation under the Act. (See Honeywood v. Foster, No. 1, 9 W. R. 855, 30 Beav. 1, Gibbons v. Shape, 11 W. R. 1087; Smith's Real and Personal Property, 754—756.)

12. A mortgagor must, after default made by him in payment of the money according to the proviso in the mortgage deed, give the mortgagee six calendar months' notice of his intention to pay off the mortgage, unless the mortgagee has taken any steps to demand payment (Coote on Mortgages, 528).

13. The freehold estate of a married woman may be conveyed by deed acknowledged by her according to the Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, s. 77).

14. Twenty years' adverse possession will create a good title to lands. If the original owner was a minor when the adverse possession commenced, he will have ten years after coming of age to bring his action to recover the land (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, ss. 2, 16).

The above answer assumes that the original owner held the lands in fee simple. If the original owner had a more limited interest, as for instance a life interest, the adverse possession will not avail as against the successor to the original owner.

15. The purchaser will hold the lands free from the trusts of the voluntary settlement (27 Eliz. c. 4; Doe v. Manning, 9 East, 59).

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By H. N. MOZLEY, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. Some of the principal classes of cases in which Courts of equity exercise jurisdiction are the following:—

- a Cases of trusts.
- b Administration of estates of testators and intestates.
- c Cases having reference to the separate estates of married women.
- d Cases of fraud, accident, and mistake.
- e Partnership, and cases of account.
- f Cases where a plaintiff seeks specific performance of an agreement under circumstances where damages at law would not be an adequate compensation.
- g Proceedings in the winding-up of joint-stock companies.

2. The following are some of the principal maxims of equity jurisprudence:—

- a No right without a remedy.
- This maxim must be understood as referring exclusively to rights capable of being judicially enforced without occasioning a greater detriment than would result from leaving them to be disposed of in foro conscientie. And it must also be understood to refer to cases where the party who is remediless at law has not lost his remedy by his own act or laches, and where there is no equal or superior adverse right.

b Equity follows the law.

The true meaning of this maxim is that equity is governed by legislative enactments and rules of law in regard to legal estates, rights, and interests, and by the analogy thereto in reference to equitable estates, rights, and interests, where such analogy plainly subsists, and where there are no peculiar circumstances rendering it necessary to deviate from this rule, or creating an equitable obligation in one of the litigant parties, and a corresponding equitable right in another.

This maxim does not apply to the case of a trust executory, which, as opposed to a trust executed, is a trust not finally or formally declared by the instrument creating it, but intended to be so declared by some future instrument.

c Vigilantibus, non dormientibus, equitas subvenit.

The meaning of this maxim is, that equity discountsenances laches, and, independently of any Statutes of Limitation, has refused to interfere where there has been gross laches in prosecuting rights, or long and unreasonable acquiescence in the assertion of adverse rights.

d Where there is equal equity the law must prevail.

In other words, if the defendant has a claim to the protection of a Court of equity equal to the claim which the plaintiff has to the assistance of the Court, there the Court will not interfere, but will leave the matter as it stands (Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed. p. 10, et. seq.).

2. In regard to mistakes in matters of law, it is a maxim that ignorantia legis non excusat. But where the mistake is one of title, arising from ignorance of a principle of law of such constant occurrence as to be understood by the community at large, this is considered sufficient to afford a presumption of undue influence, misrepresentation, mental imbecility, surprise, or confidence abused, so as to entitle the party to relief.

In regard to mistakes as to matter of fact, relief will be granted on the same presumption where the mistake is unilateral, and the fact was material to the act or contract, and was not doubtful from its own nature, and was a fact which would not be ascertained by such diligence or care as is usual in transactions of the like nature, and of which the other party was under a legal obligation to inform the mistaken person.

Where the mistake is mutual the transaction will be binding, except it was founded in a mutual surprise; or the mistake consists in supposing that the subject-matter of the contract existed, when in reality it was not in existence; or the mistake consists in one party supposing that he had purchased something which the other did not intend to sell; or the mistake is the result of a miscalculation by the defendant's agent in favour of the defendant (Carpnael v. Powis, 10 Beav. 36; Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed. 44, 45).

4. Constructive frauds are acts, statements, or omissions, which operate as virtual frauds on individuals, or, if generally permitted, would be prejudicial to the public welfare, and are not clearly resolvable into mere accident or mistake, and yet may have been unconnected with any selfish or evil design.

The following are instances of constructive frauds:—

a Agreements entered into as a reward for using influence over another, to induce him to make a will for the benefit of the obligor.

b Where a child recently after attaining majority makes over property to the father without adequate consideration, equity will set aside the proceeding as a constructive fraud, unless the father can show that the child was a free agent, and had adequate and independent advice.

Courts of equity treat proceedings tainted with constructive fraud as voidable and not void.

5. An express trust is a trust which is clearly expressed by the author thereof, or may fairly be collected from a written document (Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed. p. 113).

An implied trust is a trust which is founded in an unexpressed, but presumable, intention (Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed. p. 147).

A resulting trust is a trust the benefit of which results to the author of the trust or his representatives, owing to the trust being or becoming incapable of taking effect.

A constructive trust, as distinguished both from express and from implied trusts, may be defined to be a trust which is raised by construction of equity, in order to satisfy the demands of justice, without reference to any presumable intention of the parties.

A constructive trust may arise where a person who is only joint owner, acting bona fide, permanently benefits an estate by repairs or improvements; for a lien or trust may arise in his favour in respect of the sum he has expended in such repairs or improvements.

6. An agent or solicitor employed to sell cannot purchase from his principal unless he make it properly clear that he furnished his employer with all the knowledge which he himself possessed (Lowther v. Lowther, 13 Ves. 95; W. & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 3rd ed. 143).

Assignees of a bankrupt cannot purchase his property (W. & T. 3rd ed. 148, and cases there cited).

Executors or administrators are not permitted to purchase for themselves any part of the assets of the testator or intestate (W. & T. 3rd ed. 147, and cases there cited).

A trustee cannot be allowed to purchase the trust property from his cestui que trust. Similarly a receiver or agent employed by a trustee in managing a suit cannot purchase (W. & T. 3rd ed. 139, 140, and cases there cited).

The principle of this prohibition is stated by Lord Eldon, in Ex parte Lacey (6 Ves. 627):—"Though you may see in a particular case that the trustee" (or person standing in a fiduciary relation) "has not made advantage, it is utterly impossible to examine upon satisfactory evidence whether he has made advantage or not." The trustee or person standing in a fiduciary relation has knowledge which the other party has not. Besides which, it is difficult for a person to observe properly the fiduciary relation if he appears in the same transaction in another character.

It is possible for a party standing in one of the relations above mentioned to take any particular case out of the general rule in regard to such purchases, by dealing at arm's length with the other party. Thus, a trustee desirous to purchase the property of his cestuis que trust might do so by handing over the trust to another person and fully disclosing all the circumstances, so as no longer to stand in the position of trustee. If, however, any of the parties interested are under disability, he cannot do this without leave of the Court (Lewin on Trusts, 4th ed. 339). And so with other persons placed in fiduciary positions.

7. If, upon a treaty for sale of an estate, the owner writes a letter to the person wishing to buy it, stating that if he parts with the estate it shall be on such and such terms (specifying them), and such person, upon receipt of the letter, or within a reasonable time after it, accept the terms mentioned in it, there will be a binding agreement between the parties. The letters will not constitute an agreement unless the answer to the offer is a simple acceptance, without the introduction of any new term. The acceptance may be by parol, but it must be an unambiguous act; and, therefore, the sending of a draft of conveyance may not in all cases amount to an acceptance; and, to be binding, it must be unconditional. In general the consideration appears plainly upon the face of the agreement. Performance will not be compelled on a note or letter if any error or omission, however trifling, appear in the essential terms of the agreement.

In the case of Lord Middleton v. Wilson (Sug. Vend. & Pur. 135), a bill was brought for specific performance. From letters which had passed between the parties, it appeared that a certain number of years' purchase was to be given for the land, but it could not be ascertained whether the rents upon a few cow-gates were 5s. or 1s., and, although there was no other doubt, Lord Hardwicke held that such an agreement could not be carried into execution. He said that in these cases it ought to be considered whether at law the party could not recover damages, for, if he could not, the Court ought not to carry such agreements into execution.

See, on this subject, Sug. Vend. & Pur. 14th ed. 128—141.

8. Legal assets of a deceased person are property which creditors may make available in a court of law for the payment of debts, as having devolved upon, or been recoverable by, the executor or administrator, as such, for that purpose, simply by virtue of his office, even though the property may be of an equitable nature, and he has consequently been obliged to resort to a court of equity to vest it in himself.

Equitable assets are property which creditors can only make available in a court of equity for payment of debts, simply by virtue of an express disposition of the property, which must be carried into effect by a court of equity.

So that it is not the legal or equitable nature of the property, nor the remedy of the executor, but the remedy of the creditor, which determines whether the assets are legal or equitable.

Courts of equity follow the same rules in regard to legal assets which are adopted by courts of law, and give the same priority to the different classes of creditors which is enjoyed at law. Equitable assets are distributed pari passu among all the creditors.

Assets for the payment of debts are now generally applied in the following order:—

- a General personal estate.
- b Any estate particularly devised for the payment of debts.
- c Estates descended.
- d Property devised and bequeathed to particular devisees and legatees, but charged with the payment of debts.
- e General legacies.
- f Lands comprised in a residuary devise.
- g Specific legacies and lands specifically devised. But in Eddels v. Johnson (6 W. R. 401, 1 Giff. 22) and Pearman v. Twiss (2 Giff. 130) Vice-Chancellor Stuart held that lands specifically devised, and lands included in a residuary devise, were applicable rateably. See, however, Henneman v. Fryer, 16 W. R. 162.
- h Personality and realty over which the person whose estate is to be administered has exercised a general power of appointment.

9. Marshalling of assets may be defined to be such an arrangement of the different funds forming part of the assets of a deceased person, being the common debtor of two creditors, as may satisfy every claim, so far as, without injustice, such assets can be applied in satisfaction thereof, notwithstanding the claims of particular individuals to prior satisfaction out of some one or more of these funds.

Thus, where one party has a charge on freehold and copyhold estate, and another party has a charge on the freehold only, the latter is entitled to require that the former should be satisfied out of the copyhold estate so far as it will extend (Smith's Manual of Equity, tit. iii. chap. ii.).

The principle of marshalling assets is applied not only as between creditor and creditor, but as between legatee and legatee, and as between legatee and creditor.

10. A., B., C. have successively mortgages on the same property, A. having the legal estate. Subsequently C. takes a transfer of A.'s security, including the legal estate. Then B. seeks to redeem the first mortgage only. Equity will assist B. in doing so if C., at the time of lending his money, had notice of B.'s incumbrance, but otherwise equity will decline to do so, even though C. should have had notice of B.'s incumbrance before taking a transfer of A.'s security (Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed. pp. 287—8).

11. The doctrine of marshalling is not confined to the administration of assets; but it is applied to other cases where the parties are living.

The general doctrine is, that if a creditor has a lien on, or interest in, two funds belonging to one person, and another creditor has a lien on, or interest in, one only of the funds, and the claims of both could not be satisfied if the former were to resort to the fund in which alone the latter is interested, then the latter creditor can, in equity, compel the former to resort to the other fund in the first instance for satisfaction.

Thus it has been laid down that if a person "who has two real estates mortgages both to one person, and afterwards only one estate to a second mortgagee, who had no notice of the first, the Court, in order to relieve the second mortgagee, has directed the first to take his satisfaction out of that only which is not in the mortgage of the second mortgagee, if that is sufficient to satisfy the first mortgage." Per Lord Hardwicke, C., in Lanoy v. Duke of Athol (2 Atk. 446); Tudor's Lead. Cas. Eq. vol. ii. 3rd ed. 90; Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed. 335).

12. Election is the choosing between two rights by a person who derives one of them under an instrument in which a clear intention appears that he should not enjoy both.

The doctrine of election arises in equity in cases where a grantor or testator gives away, either knowingly or by mistake, that in which he has no interest, or the whole of that in which another person besides himself has an interest, and in the same instrument makes a gift to the owner of the property so taken away, or to the person entitled to such interest. In such cases the owner of such property, or the person entitled to such interest, must elect between taking the gift and resigning his own property or interest.

Thus, where there is a power to appoint to two, and the donee of the power appoints to one only and gives a legacy to the other, he cannot claim the legacy and also dispute the validity of the appointment.

13. A Court of equity will aid in effecting a valid settlement of the female infant's reversionary personality, according to the Infant's Settlement Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43, s. 1, which includes every kind of property, whether real or personal, and whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy. The peculiarity of the case consists in the circumstance that the infant when married will not be able to dispose of her interest in the reversionary personality even with her husband's consent, according to the old law, according to which a married woman could not dispose of reversionary interests in personal estate, which is not, in regard to property settled on marriage, altered by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 57 (See s. 4).

14. The following are the several modes of commencing proceedings in chancery:—

a By bill; which is the most usual way. Thus, for instance, if A. has agreed with B. to purchase an estate, and

A. declines to complete the purchase, B., if he wishes to enforce performance of the agreement, will file a bill against A., which in this case is called a bill for specific performance.

b By information. This differs little from a bill; the principal difference being that it is filed in the name of the Attorney-General, whether or not at the instance of private parties, for some public object. Thus, if a party desired to check the pollution of a stream, or other public nuisance, by proceedings in chancery, he would proceed by information at the suit of the Attorney-General.

c By special case. This form of proceeding was introduced by Act of Parliament in the year 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 35). A special case is applicable only where the parties are agreed as to the facts of their case, but desire the decision of the Court on the law applicable to those facts; as, for instance, if the parties desire the opinion of the Court on the construction of a deed or will.

d Petitions for the opinion of the Court. Thus,—by the statute 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 20, any trustee, &c., may apply to any chancery judge, either by petition in open court, or by summons in chambers, for advice as to the management of the trust property.

e Petitions generally. As, for instance, a petition under the Infants Settlement Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43, whereby the Court is asked to approve of a settlement made by an infant on his or her marriage.

f Summons taken out at chambers. Thus, by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35, s. 19, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 35, s. 14, executors or administrators may take out a summons at chambers for an order to take an account of the debts and liabilities of a deceased person.

g The object last mentioned may also be obtained by a motion of course. But it is not usual to commence proceedings by motion in the Court of Chancery.

15. There are three modes of defending a suit in chancery:—

a By demurrer; which is applicable where the defendant wishes to contend that the bill (or information) does not, upon the face of it, show sufficient title to relief.

b By plea; which is applicable where the defendant is prepared with a short statement of facts not mentioned in the bill, which, if inserted in the bill, would have rendered it demurrable.

c By answer. This is applicable where the defence to the plaintiff's bill consists in the detailed disproof of some, and explanation of others, of the facts and circumstances relied on by the plaintiff; the effect of such disproof and explanation being to give an entirely new complexion to the case (see Haynes' Outlines of Equity, p. 71).

IV.—BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By CHALONER W. CHUTE, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. The petitioning creditor must attend in person before the Court to prove the debt, except upon special cause proved to the satisfaction of the Court. If the debtor is a trader the trading must be proved; if the debtor is a non-trader a copy of the petition must be served on him under section 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and see as to substituted service Re Calliop (16 W. R. 446).

N.B.—Under the new Bankruptcy Act which will come into operation on the 1st January next, the debt or the aggregate amount of debts due to the petitioning creditor or creditors will have to be £50, and will have to be a liquidated sum due at law or in equity (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 6).

2. The acts of bankruptcy which may be committed by a trader are—departing the realm or otherwise absenting himself or beginning to keep house, suffering outlaws, making a fraudulent conveyance or gift, and certain similar acts with intent, in any of these cases, to defeat or delay creditors (Bankruptcy Act, 1849, s. 67). Also, after petition filed, making a preference in favour of the petitioning creditor, making default under a trader-debtor summons, &c., suffering execution by seizure and sale of goods and chattels upon judgment for a debt of not less than £50 (Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 73).

The acts of bankruptcy which may be committed by a non-trader as well as a trader are—lying in prison after arrest for debt and not giving security, or escaping from prison (Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 71), adjudication of bankruptcy in a colonial act (Ibid., s. 75), filing a declaration that he is unable to meet his engagements (Ibid., s. 72), filing a petition for adjudication against himself (Ibid., s. 86), and failure to pay or give security under a judgment-debtor summons (Ibid., ss. 76, 77).

By section 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, a non-trader departing the realm or making a fraudulent transfer commits an act of bankruptcy.

N.B. Under the new Act (not yet in operation) similar acts of bankruptcy are enumerated in section 6.

3. A debtor can obtain an adjudication against himself under section 86 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, by filing a petition and a full and accurate statement on oath of his debts and liabilities, the names and residences of his creditors, and the causes of his inability to meet his engagements.

N.B. Under the new Act, part 1, no provision seems to be made for an adjudication on the petition of a debtor.

4. A judgment-debtor summons under section 76, &c., of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, may be sued out by any judgment-creditor who is entitled to a writ of ca. sa. against the debtor. It must be served upon the debtor (sections 79 and 81), and if he appears on the summons he must submit to examination under section 82, and if he does not pay the debt and costs, or secure or compound for the same, to the satisfaction of the creditor, he may be adjudged bankrupt without petition (sections 83 and 84).

A trader-debtor summons under the 78th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, may be issued by the Court on affidavit of the debt, the delivery to the trader of an account with a notice requiring payment. The summons must be served personally, and if the party appears to the summons he must submit to examination under section 79; and if he does not appear, or on appearance refuses to admit such demand, and does not depose that he has a good defence, then, under section 80, he is deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on default of payment within fourteen days from personal service of the summons; and, by section 81, if he admits the demand on appearance, and does not pay within seven days from such admission, this is also an act of bankruptcy.

N.B.—Under the new Act (not yet in operation) the process on debtor summons will be more simple (see section 7 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71).

5. Debts may be proved in bankruptcy by delivering or sending by post a statement thereof, accompanied by a declaration, signed by the creditor (section 144 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861). Debts may also be proved after adjudication on oath under section 164 of the Bankruptcy Act 1849, and section 146 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861.

In the case of a running bill of exchange the holder may receive a dividend, deducting interest at £5 per cent., to be computed from the declaration of a dividend up to the time when the debt would become payable, and in the case of goods sold upon credit which is not yet expired, the seller may prove his debt, deducting interest on a similar principle, under sections 165 and 172 of the Act of 1849.

N.B.—Similar provisions, with an important exception as to demands in the nature of unliquidated damages, are contained in section 31 of the new Act.

6. The remedies as to right of proof for sureties and persons liable to the debts of a bankrupt are to be found in section 173 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849. If the surety has paid the debt he may stand in the shoes of the creditor, and if the creditor has not proved he may prove, and receive dividends with the other creditors.

The surety is entitled to compel the principal creditor to prove, and by receiving dividends to diminish his liability (Ex parte Rushford, 10 Ves. 409).

7. The obligee in a bottomry or respondentia bond, and the assured in any policy of insurance made upon good and valuable consideration, shall be admitted to claim, and after the loss or contingency shall have happened, may prove his debt or demand, and receive dividends with the other creditors as if the loss or contingency had happened before the filing of the petition against the obligor or insurer (s. 174 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849).

8. An annuity creditor may prove under a bankruptcy under section 175 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, and the Court will ascertain the value, having regard to the original price given for the annuity, deducting therefrom such diminution in the value thereof as shall have been caused by the lapse of time since the grant thereof to the date of the petition for adjudication.

9. If a mortgagor become bankrupt the rights of the mortgages may be affected by the doctrines as to fraudulent conveyance under the Statutes of Elizabeth, or by the doctrine of fraudulent preference. See as to the former of these Twyne's case, in 1 Smith's Leading Cases, and it must also be remembered that a conveyance to a creditor of his whole property or of the whole with the exception of merely nominal in consideration of a bygone and pre-existing debt is fraudulent under the Bankruptcy Act (see Ex parte Forley, 16 W. R. 831). The remedies of the mortgage creditor will be affected by the general doctrine that a secured creditor can only prove for his whole debt if he gives up his security, or he may receive a dividend in respect of the balance due to him after realizing or giving credit for the value of his security.

N.B.—The similar provisions as to proof by secured creditors are contained in section 40 of the new Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71.

10. Goods and chattels in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, i.e., which he has in his possession as reputed owner by the consent of the true owner, may be sold and disposed of for the benefit of the creditors under the bankruptcy under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, but it is provided by that section that transfers of ships or shares thereof by way of mortgage or security if duly registered according to the provisions of the Ship Register Act shall not be invalidated.

N.B. The section of the new Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, relating to order and disposition in section 15, clause 5, but it is to be noted that there is no exception as to assignments of ships.

11. The bankrupt may obtain his order of discharge either under section 110 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, upon proceedings in bankruptcy being suspended by creditors in meeting, or under section 158 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, after his last examination, fourteen days' notice of the sitting of the Court for such purpose having been given. Any creditor who has proved may be heard against such discharge, and the rules of granting orders of discharge are to be found in section 159.

The effect of the order is to discharge the bankrupt from all debts, claims, and demands proveable under his bankruptcy, and if he is afterwards arrested or any action is brought against him for any such debt, claim, or demand, he may plead in general that the cause of action accrued before he became bankrupt.

N.B. Under the new Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, the rules, as to the order of discharge are contained in sections 47, 48, and an important addition is added that the discharge shall not be granted unless a dividend of ten shillings in the pound has been paid.

12. Some of the grounds of the objection against the bankrupt obtaining his order of discharge are—that the bankrupt has carried on trade by means of fictitious capital or has contracted debts without reasonable expectation of payment, or has wilfully omitted to keep proper books of account with intent to conceal the true state of his affairs, or that his insolvency is attributable to rash speculation or unjustifiable extravagance in living, or that he has put any of his creditors to unnecessary expense by frivolous or vexatious defence to any action or suit to recover money due. Besides these rules, if the bankrupt is convicted of a misdemeanour, his discharge may be refused or suspended (section 159 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861).

13. Some of the offences in respect whereof a bankrupt may be indicted criminally are—concealing his effects, refusing to surrender himself, omitting to disclose a false proof of a debt, withholding the production of any deed or writing relating to his property, or mutilating any such deed or writing, fraudulently making away with any part of his property, and certain other frauds mentioned in the 221st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

14. Sections 185—191 of the Act of 1861 provide that three-fourths in number and value of the creditors meeting as therein mentioned may resolve to have the estate wound up by arrangement, and to apply to the Court to stay proceedings in the bankruptcy. The Court may confirm such resolution and stay proceedings, and upon complete execution of a deed of arrangement, and after due inquiries, may direct the deed to be registered and annul the bankruptcy, and the deed, if so registered, is to be binding on creditors not executing it.

15. The requisites in trust deeds, composition and in-spectership deeds, under section 192 of the Act of 1861, are the following:—First, a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the £10 creditors must assent to the deed in writing before its execution. Secondly, the trustees of the deed, if any, must execute it. Thirdly, the execution of the deed by the debtor must be attested by an attorney. Fourthly, the deed must be registered within twenty-eight days. Fifthly, an affidavit as to the majority assenting to the deed, and also as to the assets of the debtor must be delivered to the registrar. Sixthly, such deed must be properly executed; and seventhly, immediately upon the execution by the debtor, possession of all the property comprised therein of which the debtor can give or order possession shall be given to the trustees.

By the 1st section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 104, it was further enacted that such deeds should not bind dissentient creditors except on delivery to the registrar of, firstly, together with the deed, a list of the debts and liabilities of the debtor, the dates of and the considerations for such liabilities, the names, residences, and occupations of his creditors, the amounts due to them and the securities held by them; secondly, a statement of the debtor's property and credits, and the estimated value thereof.

V.—CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

(By E. A. C. SCHALCH, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. Criminal offences are usually divided into three classes: (1) Treasons; (2) Felonies; (3) Misdemeanours. Treason is an offence against the Sovereign or the State. The distinction between felonies and misdemeanours is purely arbitrary, but the former are generally the more serious crimes. This distinction, however, does not always exist.

2. The Court of Queen's Bench is the principal criminal court. There are also the courts of quarter sessions, petty sessions, and the courts in boroughs; the three last of which have a limited criminal jurisdiction. There is also the court of criminal appeal called the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

3. The Queen's Bench is the only one of the three courts which has jurisdiction over crimes. Its jurisdiction is generally put in motion by bill in the name of the sovereign, presented to and found by a grand jury (after which it is called an indictment), or occasionally in the case of misdemeanours, by a criminal information.

4. General Quarter Sessions are that species of general sessions which is held under the authority of the commission of the peace by two or more justices (one being of the quorum) at some place within the county, fixed by their precept, once in every quarter of a year, as directed by various statutes. The Court of Quarter Sessions is a court of oyer and terminer and a court of record, and not a court of inferior jurisdiction. Its jurisdiction is not unlimited although it is extensive. It comprehends all the lesser criminal offences. The following, amongst other crimes, are excluded from its jurisdiction:—murder, capital felonies, or any felonies which, when committed by a person not previously convicted of felony, is punishable by penal servitude for life, treason, misprision of treason, perjury, subornation of perjury, forgery, bigamy, abduction, bribery, and other serious crimes. The jurisdiction can only be ascertained by reference to the various statutes conferring jurisdiction on quarter sessions. It has also jurisdiction in some matters not criminal, as, for instance, in cases of rating and other civil questions, or between members of friendly societies.

5. Petty sessions are sittings of one or two justices of the peace, who are empowered by statute to try in a summary way, and without jury, such minor offences as are specified in the statutes giving them jurisdiction. Its jurisdiction is chiefly over crimes of comparatively small importance. It has also some jurisdiction in matters of a civil nature. Persons are brought before the Court of Petty Sessions by a summons or warrant. The Court then adjudicates on the matter before it.

6. He should be brought before a magistrate and evidence should then be produced to show that he is guilty of the crime of which he is accused. If a prima facie case is made out the magistrate ought to commit him for trial. He may, however, in certain cases accept bail.

7. Under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 21, a person accused may be remanded for any period at the discretion of the justices, "not exceeding eight clear days."

Simple larceny is the wrongful taking and carrying away of the personal property of another with a felonious intent to convert it to the taker's own use without the consent of the owner.

9. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 29, "whosoever shall, either during the life of the testator or after his death, for any fraudulent purpose, destroy . . . the whole or any part of any will or codicil . . . shall be guilty of felony."

10. Felony. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 28, "whoever shall . . . for any fraudulent purpose cancel or obliterate . . . the whole or any part of any document of title to lands shall be guilty of a felony."

11. Yes. Under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3, a bailee converting the goods to his own use is guilty of larceny whether or not he breaks bulk or otherwise determines the bailment.

12. Forgery has been defined as "the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right," or as "a false making, a making malò animo of any written instrument for the purpose of fraud or deceit."

13. Yes. A fraudulent insertion, alteration, or erasure in any material part of a true instrument whereby a new operation is given to it amounts to a forgery.

14. It is forgery, as the use of a fictitious name is sufficient to constitute the crime forgery.

15. The principal Acts are the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts, 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 94 to 100, inclusive. The Habitual Criminals Act of last session, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 99, is also an important statute.

QUESTIONS FOR THE INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.

I.—FROM CHITTY ON CONTRACTS.

1. What are specialties, and what simple contracts? and describe the principal differences between them?

2. What is an escrow?

3. Mention exceptions to the rule that both parties must be bound by a contract, or that neither is liable.

4. What is an implied contract?

5. When is it necessary that a simple contract should be in writing, and when not?

6. When is the property altered by the sale of a specific chattel, and when by the sale of goods part of a larger bulk?

7. What is the effect at law and what in equity of a grant of goods not in existence at the time of the grant?

II.—FROM WILLIAMS ON THE PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

8. What estate is conferred by a grant to A. B. simply?

9. What was the ancient mode of barring an estate tail, and by what statute was the modern practice substituted?

10. A. B., the "purchaser" of an estate in fee simple, dies intestate, leaving surviving him a daughter by his first marriage, and two sons by his second marriage; to whom does the estate in fee simple descend?

11. Is a will revoked by the subsequent marriage of the testator?

12. What is the meaning and effect of "foreclosure," as regards the rights of mortgagor and mortgagee?

13. Does a covenant to produce title deeds run with the land?

14. An estate stands limited to such uses as A. B. may, by deed or will, executed in the presence of three or more witnesses, appoint—A. B. by his will, executed as required by the Will's Act, but in the presence of two witnesses only, assumes to exercise the power. Is his will a valid execution of the power?

III.—FROM J. W. SMITH'S MANUAL OF EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE.

15. Describe the process of proving a will in chancery.

16. State some of the eighteen grounds on which a bill of discovery may be resisted.

17. What equity has a wife, and in respect of what property, against the assignees of her bankrupt husband; and wherein does it differ from what her equity would have been had there been no bankruptcy?

18. What contracts, debts, and charges of a wife are binding on her separate estate?

19. What is the practice of the Court as to the property of a ward who has married without settlement soon after attaining majority?

20. When will the Court interpose to stop a private nuisance?

21. What is a bill of interpleader? Give an instance.

IV.—BOOK KEEPING.

22. What is the duty of a merchant or trader in reference to book-keeping—and what is likely to result from a neglect of that duty?

23. Give the names of the principal books of account required in book-keeping by single entry, and of any subordinate books which may occur to you.

24. If a merchant desires to know how he stands with regard to a particular correspondent, to which of his books does he refer? Give its name, and describe it?

25. If he desires to know how he stands with reference to the whole of his transactions, at any given time, how does he proceed? Give the name of the summary of his accounts to which he must have recourse, and describe it.

26. What is a "stock account?" State the items of which it is composed, on the one side, and on the other, and what is represented by the balance?

ADMISSION OF ATTORNEYS.

Michaelmas Term, 1869.

The following days have been appointed for the admission of attorneys in the Court of Queen's Bench:—

Wednesday Nov. 24 | Thursday Nov. 25

ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS.

The Master of the Rolls has appointed Thursday, the 25th of November, 1869, at the Rolls Court, Chancery-lane, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, for swearing in solicitors.

Every person desirous of being sworn in on the above day must leave his common law admission or his certificate of practice for the current year at the secretary's office, Rolls-yard, Chancery-lane, on or before Wednesday, the 24th of November.

The papers of those gentlemen who cannot be admitted at common law till the last day of Term will be received at the secretary's office up to twelve o'clock at noon on that day, after which time no papers can be received.

GENERAL EXAMINATION OF THE INNS OF COURT;

Michaelmas Term, 1869.

General Examination of Students of the Inns of Court, held at Lincoln's Inn Hall, on the 28th, 29th, and 30th days of October, and the 1st day of November, 1869.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS AT LANCASTER.

GENERAL RULES AND ORDERS.

The Right Honourable Frederick Temple, Lord Dufferin, K.P., K.C.B., Chancellor of the Duchy and County Palatine of Lancaster, with the advice and consent of Sir James Hannen, Chief Justice, and Sir George Hayes, one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, doth hereby, in pursuance of the Common Pleas at Lancaster Amendment Act, 1869, and in pursuance and execution of all other powers enabling him in this behalf; and the said Chief Justice and Justice do hereby, also in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the session of Parliament, held in the fourth and fifth years of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled "An Act for improving the practice and proceedings of the Court of Common Pleas of the County Palatine of Lancaster;" and in pursuance and execution of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, and of all other powers and authorities enabling them in this behalf, do make and publish the following general rules, and do order and direct as follows:—

All existing general rules and orders of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, except the orders of the Spring Assizes, 31 Vict. (1868), are hereby cancelled.

Districts of the court.

1. For the purposes of the transaction of the business of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, the County Palatine shall be considered as divided into three districts; one consisting of such parts of the county as are situated within the hundred of West Derby, such district being called the Liverpool district, another consisting of such parts of the county as are situated within the hundred of Salford, such district being called the Manchester district; and the third consisting of such parts of the county as are situated within the several hundreds of Lonsdale, Amounderness, Leyland, and Blackburn, such district being called the Preston district.

2. All causes, suits, and proceedings to be instituted from and after the 10th day of November next shall be instituted and transacted by or in the office of the district prothonotary of the district within which the address for service of the attorney, or of the plaintiff, when suing in person, by whom such causes, suits, and proceedings shall be instituted shall at the time of the same having been instituted, be situate and where the attorney instituting such suit shall have his address for service out of the county such causes, suits or proceedings shall be instituted in the district where the defendant then is or permanently resides.

3. In construing the following rules the word prothonotary shall be taken to include each district prothonotary, and the word court shall mean the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, unless the contrary be expressed.

4. The office of the prothonotary shall be open from ten o'clock in the morning till four o'clock in the afternoon on every day not being a Sunday, Christmas-day, Good Friday, Easter Eve, Easter Monday, Easter Tuesday, Whit Monday, or a day appointed for a public fast or thanksgiving, and not being a day which the Chancellor of the Duchy and County Palatine shall order to be kept as a holiday, except Saturdays, and on Saturday from ten o'clock in the forenoon until one o'clock in the afternoon, provided that in the Manchester and Preston districts the office of the prothonotary shall be closed during the whole of Whitsun week.

5. The prothonotary is empowered to do all such things, and to transact all such business, and to exercise all such authority and jurisdiction in respect of the said court, as by virtue of any statute or custom, or by the rules and practice of her Majesty's Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer of Pleas, at Westminster, or any of them respectively, are now done, transacted or exercised by a judge of the said courts at Westminster, sitting in chambers, except (unless by consent of the parties) in respect of the following proceedings and matters, that is to say:—

The removal of causes from inferior courts, other than the removal of judgments, for the purpose of having execution.

Prohibitions and injunctions.

The referring of causes under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

The rectifying of omissions or mistakes in the register under the Joint Stock Company's Acts.

Reviewing taxation of costs.

Staying proceedings after verdict.

Acknowledgments of married women; and Orders charging stock, funds, annuities, or dividends, or the annual produce thereof.

6. In case any matter shall appear to the prothonotary to be proper for the decision of a judge, the prothonotary may refer the same to a judge, and the judge may either dispose of the matter or refer the same back to the prothonotary, with such directions as he may think fit.

7. That appeals from the prothonotary's order or decision shall be made by summons, such summons to be taken out within four days after the decision complained of, or such further time as may be allowed by a judge or prothonotary.

8. All summonses to attend a judge in chambers in this Court, whether by way of an appeal from an order of the prothonotary or otherwise, shall be issued out of the prothonotary's office, and made returnable either at the judge's chambers in London, or, if the judges shall at the time of the return thereof be on circuit in Lancashire, the same may, at the option of the attorney issuing the same, be made returnable at any place in Lancashire where the judges may be.

9. The judge shall indorse a memorandum of his order on the original of the summons, and deliver the same, together with any original affidavits used on the hearing of the summons, to the counsel, attorney, or agent of the party who has issued such summons, and he shall forward the same immediately by post, prepaid, to the prothonotary, who shall thereupon draw up the formal order.

10. In case such summons so indorsed shall not be received at the office of the prothonotary on the day following that on which such summons has been disposed of, it shall be lawful for the prothonotary to draw up the order from any minute or letter signed by the counsel or attorney of the opposite party.

11. The appeal to be no stay unless so ordered by a judge or prothonotary.

12. The costs of such appeal shall be in the discretion of the judge.

Attorneys.

13. Any attorney of one of her Majesty's superior courts may be admitted an attorney of this court on producing his certificate of admission in one of the superior courts at Westminster, and his certificate to practise, or otherwise satisfying the prothonotary thereof, and on signing the roll of attorneys of this court, but no attorney shall be admitted to practise in any district until he has signed the roll of that district.

14. The prothonotary shall cause to be kept an alphabetical book at his office, to be there inspected by any attorney of this court or his clerk, without fee or reward, and every attorney practising in the district shall enter in such book (in alphabetical order) his name and place of business, or some other proper place where he may be served with pleadings, notices, summonses, orders, rules, and other proceedings; and as often as any such attorney shall change his place of business, or the place where he may be so served as aforesaid, he shall make the like entry thereof in the said book, and all pleadings, notices, summonses, orders, rules, and other proceedings which do not require a personal service shall be deemed sufficiently served on such attorney if a copy thereof shall be left at the place lastly entered in such book, with any person resident at or belonging to such place; and if any such attorney shall neglect to make such entry, the fixing up of any notice, or the copy of any pleadings, notice, summons, order, rule, or other proceeding for such attorney in the prothonotary's office, shall be deemed a sufficient notice.

15. In all cases where a party sues or defends in person, he shall, upon issuing any writ of summons or other proceeding, or entering an appearance, enter in a book to be kept for that purpose at the prothonotary's office an address at which all pleadings, notices, summonses, orders, rules, or other proceedings not requiring personal service shall be left, and if such address shall not be entered in the said book, then the opposite party shall be at liberty to leave the same for him at his place of residence, or to proceed by sticking up all pleadings, notices, summonses, orders, rules, or other proceedings in the district prothonotary's office, without the necessity of any further service.

16. Service of pleadings, notices, summonses, orders, rules, and other proceedings shall be made before five o'clock p.m., except on Saturdays, when it shall be made before one o'clock p.m. If made after five o'clock p.m., on any day except Saturday the service shall be deemed as made on the following day, and if made after one o'clock p.m. on Saturday the service shall be deemed as made on the following Monday.

Service of pleadings, summonses, &c., by post.

17. If a pleading, notice, summons, order, rule, or other proceeding not requiring to be served personally, has to be served upon an attorney or party whose address for service is not in the same borough as the address for service of the attorney or party having to serve the same, such pleading, notice, summons, order, rule, or other proceeding may be served by enclosing the same in a wrapper or envelope, addressed to the attorney or party to be served therewith at his address for service, and forwarding the same by the general post prepaid and registered, provided that if no address for service of a party suing or defending in person shall have been given the same may be forwarded in manner aforesaid to his usual or last known place of residence, provided also that the prothonotary may when and if he shall think fit stay the issuing of any process or the drawing up or proceeding on any summons, rule, or order until the expiration of a period to be named by him after proof of such order, rule, or other proceeding having been served otherwise than by post.

18. Affidavits filed for the purpose of proving the service of notices, summonses, orders, rules and other proceedings by post shall state the time and the post office when and at which the letter or packet posted for effecting such service was so posted, and shall also state the words and figures forming the address of the letter or packet so posted.

Application by post for writs, &c.

19. Any attorney whose address for service is above seven miles from the office of the prothonotary shall not be required to attend there personally, or by a clerk or agent, for the purpose of applying for a writ or a summons, or to enter an appearance in the action, but may apply for or to enter the same by forwarding the necessary documents, completely filled up and ready for sealing or signing by the prothonotary, to the prothonotary at his office, by post prepaid, provided there be enclosed therewith a post-office order, payable to the prothonotary or his order at the post-office nearest to which the prothonotary's office is situate, for the fee payable to the prothonotary upon the issuing of such writ or summons, or the entry of such appearance, and provided there be also enclosed therein an envelope properly stamped and addressed to the attorney making such application, wherein such writ or summons, when issued, may be transmitted to him by post, an order of the prothonotary when drawn up, may be transmitted to the attorney entitled thereto in like manner.

Application of Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

20. In addition to those enactments and provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which are applied by section 229 to the Court, the enactments and provisions of the said Act, with respect to concurrent writs (except as to service elsewhere than in the County Palatine of Lancaster), and all the provisions of the said Act with respect to notice of trial and inquiry and countermand thereof, and with respect to the action of ejectment are hereby applied to the Court.

Application of rules of the Courts at Westminster.

21. The under-mentioned General Rules of the Superior Court of Common Law at Westminster shall, so far as the same are applicable mutatis mutandis, be, and they are hereby adopted as General Rules of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster.

The Regulæ Generales as to pleading of Hilary Term, 1853, numbers 1 to 32, both inclusive.

The Regulæ Generales of Hilary Term, 16 Vict., January 11th, 1853, except those numbered 1, 7, 9, 31, 34, 36, 39, 43, 45, 47, 75, 120, 131, 132, 144, 147, 150, 154, 158, 164, 166, 167, 173, and 175.

Rules of Michaelmas Vacation, 27th November, 1854. The forms of proceedings contained in the schedules to the said Regulæ Generales and rules respectively may be used in the cases to which they are applicable with such alterations as the nature of the action, the description of the Court in which the action is depending, the character of the parties, or the circumstances of the case, may render necessary; but any variance therefrom, not being in matter of substance, shall not affect their validity or regularity.

Regulæ Generales of November 26th, 1855.

Regulæ Generales of Easter Term, April 23rd, 1857.

Regulæ Generales of Hilary Term, January 30th, 1858.

Regulæ Generales of Hilary Term, 25th Vict., January 21st, 1862.

Regulæ Generales of Trinity Term, 6th June, 1867.

Attorney's costs.

22. The directions to the masters of the said courts at Westminster, and the scale of costs of 27th January, 1853, shall be taken as directions to the prothonotary, and as the scale of costs of the court, mutatis mutandis.

Prothonotary's fees.

23. The table of fees to be taken in respect of business to be transacted before the prothonotary shall be the same as by the table of fees of the said courts at Westminster, published in the London Gazette of 24th November, 1852, are specified as proper to be taken in the offices of the masters and in the chambers of the judges.

Writ of summons.

24. When a writ of summons is indorsed in the special form mentioned in section 27 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the following are the amounts which may be endorsed by the plaintiff's attorney upon the writ for costs of judgment, and to include mileage:—

In actions above £20, £3 8s. 0d.
In actions under £20, £2 14s. 0d.

Where the plaintiff's attorney, at the time of issuing the writ, claims more than the sum fixed as above, the endorsement on the writ of summons, in respect of costs, shall be as follows:—"Such sum as shall be allowed on taxation for costs." And in case the plaintiff shall be found not entitled to more costs than such fixed sums, or, if more than one-sixth shall be disallowed, the plaintiff's attorney shall pay the costs of taxation; so if the attorney has endorsed on the writ one of the fixed sums for the costs of judgment, and claims more costs on signing judgment, and on taxation shall be found not entitled to more than such sum, or if more than one-sixth be taken off on taxation, the plaintiff's attorney shall in like manner pay the costs of taxation;

Pleadings.

25. When the defendant shall appear either in person or by attorney, the declaration and all pleas and other subsequent pleadings shall be delivered between the parties or their attorneys, as the case may require.

26. All pleas to the jurisdiction shall be delivered before the expiration of four days from the delivery of the declaration.

27. In all cases the time for pleading in bar, unless extended by the prothonotary, shall be eight days.

28. Either party may give to the opposite party a notice to reply or rejoin, as the case may be, in four days, otherwise judgment; but the prothonotary may, at his discretion, grant further time to reply.

Costs in gross.

29. In all cases upon interlocutory applications, where the Court or a judge shall deem it proper to award costs to either party, it shall be optional with the Court or a judge to refer the costs to the prothonotary to be taxed, or, by the order, direct the payment of a sum in gross in lieu of taxed costs, and also to direct by and to whom such sum in gross shall be paid.

Return of summons.

30. If the opposite attorney shall not endorse on the summons his consent to an order, and shall not attend at the return thereof, or within half an hour thereafter, the order required may be made on an affidavit of service and attendance of the summons.

General practice.

31. The practice, where no rules and orders apply to the contrary, shall be as nearly conformable as may be to the rules and practice of the Superior Courts at Westminster, as the same now are or hereafter may be made or altered.

DUFFERIN AND CLANBOYNE.
JAMES HANNEN,
G. HAYES.

23rd of October, 1869.

THE NEW PREMIER OF CANADA.—Sir John Alexander Macdonald, K.C.B., who has formed a new Administration in Canada, is the eldest son of the late Hugh Macdonald, Esq., of Kingston, Canada West, who was a native of Sutherlandshire, in Scotland, but established himself in Canada in the year 1820. The new Canadian Premier was born in 1815, and received his early education at the Royal Grammar School of Kingston, Canada, whence he proceeded to Queen's University, in that colony, where he eventually graduated as LL.D. He was called to the Canadian Bar in 1836, and in ten years was advanced to the dignity of Queen's Counsel, when he became a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada. In 1844 he entered the Parliament of Canada West, being chosen as the representative of Kingston. He held various offices in the Government, including those of Commissioner of Crown Lands and Receiver-General. He served as Attorney-General from September, 1854, till May, 1862 (with only the interval of a few days), and again from 1864 to July, 1867, when he was appointed the first premier of the united provinces of Canada, and was at the same time made a member of the Privy Council of the Canadian dominion. He had previously been sent to England as chairman of the conference of delegates from British North America on the measure of confederation, and at the conclusion of their labours was created an extra Knight-Commander of the Civil Division of the Order of the Bath. Sir John Macdonald, who has thus become premier a second time, has been twice married.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

At the opening of the past week the markets were generally inactive. Subsequently a marked improvement has taken place in the railway market, especially as to the home stocks and shares. Consols show a slight tendency towards firmness, but foreign securities are inactive. At the fortnightly Stock Exchange settlement on Wednesday there was a heavy demand for money; the pressure, however, soon abated.

A MARRIED WOMAN ADMITTED TO THE BAR IN IOWA.

A few weeks since, Mrs. Arabella A. Mansfield, A.B., of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, was admitted to the bar, and authorized to practise law in that State.

The Mount Pleasant Journal, in giving an account of her admission, says:—

"Mrs. Mansfield is a young married lady, of about twenty-four years of age, is a graduate of the Iowa Wesleyan University, and a lady of a strong mind. That she has the brains and the necessary ability to make a good record for herself in the profession of her choice, no one will dispute. Her husband, Prof. J. M. Mansfield, was also admitted at the same time.

The following is a part of the report of the committee appointed by the court to examine Mrs. Mansfield:

"Your committee take unusual pleasure in recommending the admission of Mrs. Mansfield, not only because she is the first lady who has applied for this authority in this State, but because, in her examination, she has given the very best rebuke possible to the imputation that ladies cannot qualify for the practice of law. And we feel confident from the intimation of the court given on the application made that we speak not only the sentiments of the court, and of your committee, but the entire members of the bar, when we say that we heartily welcome Mrs. Mansfield as one of our members, and most cordially recommend her admission.

"GEORGE B. CORKHILL, } Committee."
"E. A. VANCE, }

Hers is the only instance, we believe, of a lady making application to be admitted to the bar in Iowa.—Chicago Legal News.

A JURY ROUNDLY REBUKED.—The Chicago Legal Journal has the following:—The recent trial of the engineer, Griffin, the author of the Mast Hope disaster on the Erie railroad, affords a theme for much newspaper comment. In disobedience of a rule of the road, he started his engine without orders, and the consequence was a collision which caused the death of six persons and the injury of many more. The coroner's jury directly charged the engineer with wilfully causing the disaster; but when he was put upon his trial, though the evidence was undisputed and the charge of the judge strong against him, the jury returned a verdict not guilty. Judge Barrett, before whom Griffin was tried, was very indignant at the verdict, and when the jury assembled next day, he poured out his wrath upon them in a remarkable address which is thus reported:—

"Gentlemen: You last night returned into court after a hearing of two days, with a verdict of not guilty in the case of the Commonwealth against James Griffin. This was not expected, and your verdict was against law, against justice, and an outrage against humanity. You violated the obligations of your oath—a plain, simple obligation to render a verdict according to the evidence. Instead of that you rendered a verdict against every particle of evidence. The cause of defendant was abandoned by his counsel. Drowning men will catch at straws. The theory of the defence is unknown to the law, and the counsel for the defendant did not believe it themselves. I was, and still am, astonished at your verdict. I am astonished that you should in this way set aside the law and violate your oaths; and I trust that the spirits of the dead, dying, bleeding, and burnt victims of Mast Hope will rebuke you as long as you live. We have no power to cure the great wrong which you have inflicted on the community."

The judge continued at considerable length, and concluded his rebuke to the astonished jury as follows:—

"In future I hope that you will feel a proper regard for your oaths. You are now discharged from any further duty at this court. You are not fit to sit as jurymen. I will not try causes before such a jury."

There is a probability (according to the London Scotsman) of the vacancy of the Court of Session, caused by Lord Manor's death, not being filled.

What would our subscribers say if we were in the habit of regaling them with paragraphs such as the following, which we take from the Chicago Legal News?—"On Thursday evening of this week the family circle of Robert T. Lincoln, a member of the Chicago bar, and son of our lamented President, was increased by the addition of a charming little daughter." The C. L. N., it may be remembered, is edited by a lady.

The New York Tribune of October 15 says, speaking of the suicide of the late Lord Justice Clerk:—"Does not this in-dicade in corrupt England a tenderness of public conscience which free America has long out-grown? It would be easy to name a hundred legislators in this country who hold up their heads under far more damaging accusations, and a score of judges to whom bribery may almost be called a regular source of income. But not one of them would blush to send a poor wretch to jail for offences to which they themselves are regularly accustomed."

A FEMALE LAWYER ON LAWYERS GENERALLY.—The Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser says:—One day last week a novel case was tried in the Court House at Greenville. Judge M. C. Lane brought suit against Miss Josephine Hutton for a fee. The lady appeared in court, pleaded her own case, examined witnesses, and made a long speech to the jury. The case, however, went against her. Her reason for appearing was that she did not believe an honest lawyer was to be found in the country. She said, among other things, that if an earthquake was to come and the clouds were to fall, she believed that the first thing thought of by the lawyers would be the collection of their fees preparatory to entering upon that long journey in search of a future home deep down in the dominions of his Satanic Majesty, whither they were all slowly but surely tending.

Messrs. Macniven & Cameron have sent us sample boxes of their "Owl," "Pickwick," and "Waverley" Pens. We can safely recommend all three to the notice of the profession.

BREAKFAST.—EPPE'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite. The "Civil Service Gazette" remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoas, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in tin-lined packets, labelled—JAMES EPPS & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.—[Advt.]

Where difficulty is experienced in procuring the Journal with regularity in the Provinces, it is requested that application be made direct to the Publisher.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 20, 1869.

IN ALL PROBABILITY when Lord Dufferin accepted office as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster nothing was further from his mind than that he should ever be obliged to sit in judgment on appeals from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor. By the Act of 1854 the powers of the Court of Appeal are exercisable by the Lords Justices, or by the Chancellor of the Duchy sitting either alone or jointly with either or both of the Lords Justices. The decisions of Vice-Chancellors James and Wickens have been found so good that scarcely any have been appealed of late. At length, however, an appeal from Vice-Chancellor Wickens came on for hearing last week, and there being, thanks to the economical policy of the Government, only one Lord Justice, the appeal must have gone unheard had not Lord Dufferin submitted to come and play dummy to Lord Justice Giffard. Not possessing a wig, his Lordship sat wigless, robed in his academic gown, and entertained himself as best he could while Lord Justice Giffard disposed of the case. The Chancellor must have found the novel occupation rather tedious, inasmuch as the case occupied two days. This incident serves to illustrate the amount gained by the public through the persistence of the Government in not filling up the vacancy in the Lords Justices' Court. If, as people suppose, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to be credited with this piece of economy, it would serve him right if he were made to sit daily in the court which bears his name and listen to arguments of the driest possible law. If Mr. Lowe had been in Lord Dufferin's place, he would probably have insisted on giving an original judgment. What is the precise object of the Government in declining to fill up the vacancy in the Lords Justices' Court we do not profess to understand, unless it be a general repugnance, partaking of the nature of monomania, to the elevation of any person whatever to the bench.

It has, we understand, been now announced that the vacancy in the Scotch Court of Session, occasioned by the death of Lord Manor, is not to be filled up. Yet the late judge left a long cause list undisposed of, and the business of the court is falling rapidly into arrear, simply because the judges, already very hard worked, cannot cope with an extra burden.

We hear also that in Dublin serious inconvenience is experienced by suitors, in consequence of the delay in appointing a successor to the late Master of the Rolls.

WE LATELY COMMENTED on a notable scheme of Chancery retrenchment, which in effect consisted in reducing the number of equity judges of first instance to three by converting the Master of the Rolls into an appellate judge, without appointing any other person to supply his place as a judge of first instance. Had the contrivers of this plan ever considered what would be the result of their scheme being carried into effect, except from an ex. d. point of view? After all that a powerful contemporary has said about the powers of primary jurisdiction being in excess of the requirements of the public, the fact remains that there is a certain amount of business to be done every year, and a certain number of days for it to be done in. We find that last year the Master of the Rolls sat 151 days, and the three Vice-Chancellors 502 days, or an average of 167 days each; the difference being chiefly accounted for by the sittings of the Master of the Rolls on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If the court over which the Master of the Rolls now presides be suppressed, the work now done in that court will be distributed among the three Vice-Chancellors, and in order to dispose of it, assuming them to dispose of it with the same rapidity as his Lordship now does, they must sit an average of fifty days each additional, or 217 days in all. We presume that even the writer in the Times will not expect a judge to sit longer than from ten to three or four daily, besides attendance at chambers. They must, therefore, sit about 217 days a-piece in order to get through their business; for it is to be supposed that one of the requirements of the public is that arrears shall not be suffered to accumulate.

THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS has commenced hearing the appeals from revising barristers, which are few in number this year. There were two appeals entered which related to the lodger franchise, but these have unfortunately been both withdrawn, and, therefore, there will be no decision of the Court this year upon any of the questions which have troubled the revising barristers in reference to that franchise. The first case heard by the Court was an appeal from a decision of the revising barrister for Bradford, who had held that a householder was disqualified from being registered under the Act of 1867, by the fact of his taking in a lodger who besides occupying a bedroom was allowed to use a sitting room jointly with the rest of the household. This decision was based upon the assumption that, under these circumstances, the householder was only a joint occupier of his house, and as such not qualified under the recent Act. Of course, if this had been so, it would have taken the franchise from a very large proportion of those who were supposed to have been enfranchised, and it would have been somewhat remarkable, if there had been anything in the point, that it should not have been discovered at the first registration under the Act. Of course, however, the Court had little difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the lodger and the householder could not be considered as joint occupiers, and, therefore, reversed the decision. The next case related to the occupiers of chambers in the Temple. It will be remembered that it was held last year that the occupier of one room, as under-tenant, could not be registered in respect of a "house." Upon the strength of this decision, the revising barrister in the present year held that those barristers who rented from the Inn a set of chambers, but who underlet one or more rooms, could not be registered in respect of a house unless they had expressly reserved power to enter the rooms of their under-tenants whenever they pleased. This decision created considerable surprise at the time, and has now been reversed. It was founded upon the assumption, in the first place, that a constructive occupation was out of the question, so that the voter could only rely on his occupation of that part of his chambers, which he did not underlet, and secondly on a sort of algebraical proposition that a house, minus part of a house, could not be a whole house. The Court did not seem quite to agree with the latter proposition; but they decided the case on the ground that constructive occupation of part of the qualifying premises with actual occupation of the residue was sufficient. Perhaps the point most worthy of notice was the emphasis with which the Court explained their decision of last year as deciding merely that the under-tenants were not qualified for a "house." We pointed out last year that the qualification, if one at all, was in respect of "another building" ejusdem generis with shop or counting house, each of which terms evidently relate to something which is part of another larger edifice; so that, in considering what constitutes such "other building," the question of structural severance, which is of importance in the case of a house, becomes immaterial. Probably the Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Willes, in the remarks they made on the the decision of last year, meant to intimate that it was no authority upon this further question, as certainly will be seen to be the case when the qualification of the claimant there as entered on the list is referred to.

IT IS A WELL ESTABLISHED RULE of evidence that when a document is in the hands of the adversary who withholds it at the trial, secondary evidence of its contents will be admitted, if notice to produce the original has been duly given. "In the application of this rule no distinction is recognised between civil and criminal cases" (Taylor on Evidence, vol. 1 p. 483, 5th ed.). There is an exception to the rule, if from the nature of the action or indictment "the defendant must know that he will be charged with the possession of an instrument, and will be called upon to produce it." (Taylor on Evidence, vol. 1 p. 442, 5th ed.) In such cases secondary evidence of the contents of the document is admissible without giving notice to produce. This exception has been recognised in actions of trover for written instruments, prosecutions for stealing documents, and in similar cases. It has, however, been held that this exception does not apply to a prosecution for forgery of a deed. (Reg. v. Howarth, 4 C. & P. 254.)

The Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved in Ireland decided last Saturday that, on an indictment for forging and uttering a bank-note, secondary evidence of the note, which had been returned to the prisoner before the commencement of the prosecution, was not admissible, as notice to produce had not been given to the prisoner. This decision follows Reg. v. Howarth, but it is of importance, as it tends to shake the authority upon which the exception to the general rule requiring notice to produce is based.

It is difficult to reconcile Reg. v. Howarth and Reg. v. Fitzsimmons with other cases, where it has been held that notice to produce is unnecessary "when the instrument itself is the subject of the charge against the prisoner" (Reg. v. Brennan, 3 Caw. & D. 109). The cases that have thus decided are not of great weight, and their authority is necessarily much weakened by the decision in Reg. v. Fitzsimmons, and at present the very existence of the supposed exception to the general rule is therefore somewhat doubtful.

THE LETTER OF "H. R." in our columns of this week deserves a short notice. "H. R." recounts a somewhat singular occurrence as having lately happened at Newington. A man bought an estate in that parish twenty years ago, and possessed it in peace until about two years from this date, when he was disagreeably astonished by learning that some one claiming a title to the property had distrained on his tenants for rent, and seized a certain amount of furniture, &c. He replevied in the county court, and his tenants got back their goods. When the action of ejectment, which he was under obligation to bring to try the legal right to the property, came to a trial, the defendant, the distrainer, put in no appearance, and suffered judgment by default. Being subsequently brought before the Court for non-payment of the costs awarded, this adverse claimant proved to be a very poor old woman, lately an inmate of the union workhouse, who could say no more than that she was sure the property was hers. The possessor naturally anticipated no further annoyance in the matter, but last week was again most unpleasantly disabused by another distress put in by the same claimant.

This is "H. R.'s" story, upon which he argues that the present law of distress should be abolished, and the landlord left to his action. His argument is, that since anyone may distrain upon anyone else (which is true), any pauper may put any householder to endless expense by distraining without the shadow of a claim, and the wrongdoer being a pauper, the landlord can have no redress. Secondly, he says, any thief may come with a sham distress warrant and rifle your house of its contents.

Now, the case narrated by "H. R." is, if accurately stated by him, an unfortunate one. We are glad also to say that it is a very uncommon one. It is perfectly true that you have only to find a broker willing to act and to deliver him a distress warrant, in order, without having the shadow of a title, to distrain upon any house you please; exempli gratia—a crossing-sweeper might, in that way, put a distress into Mr. Disraeli's house, and though Mr. Disraeli would, of course, would get back his goods, he would be put to great inconvenience, and would get nothing out of the crossing-sweeper. But "H. R." forgets that the broker is a trespasser as well as his principal. He may either be sued alone or joined with the person for whom he acted. A plaintiff usually assumes that the broker is less solvent than his principal (besides the fact that the broker is almost sure to have been the least in fault); but there is no reason whatever why he should not sue the broker for damages, leaving the latter to his own remedy over against the person who instructed him to distrain. This consideration renders nugatory "H. R.'s" corollary, besides rendering such instances extremely rare through the brokers being put upon their guard.

As to "H. R.'s" second argument, that a gang of thieves might come with a sham distress warrant and sack the house of any one of us—it is entirely worthless, for the simpler reason that it applies to every compulsory process of our law. The same may be said of all sorts of warrants. A knot of thieves might dress up as policemen, and enter any house with a pretended search warrant (indeed, it is on record that some daring thieves actually carried a man in this way before a magistrate, and eventually left him, after despoiling him of his watch and so forth); but I am not on that account justified in arguing that all policemen should be repealed, disendowed, and disestablished.

THE CONFUSION created by sections 7 and 10 of the County Courts Act 1867, was again exemplified at the Lambeth County Court a few days ago. An attorney applied to the Court in terms of section 7 to have a day fixed for the trial of a cause remitted from the Queen's Bench. On referring to the section the judge said it was necessary that the writ should be endorsed for a sum of £50 or less to enable him to try the cause. There was no sum endorsed on the writ; but the particulars of demand disclosed a claim for £100 which took away his power. If the action had been one of tort for any amount, or however complicated, he could try it under section 10—but the Legislature had, by section 7, declared him incompetent to try a case of simple contract if more than £50 was claimed. As this case at present stood, the only court competent to try it was the Queen's Bench. The absurdity pointed out by the learned judge was shortly afterwards illustrated by his fixing a day, in compliance with an application under section 10, for trying a running-down case from the Common Pleas, in which the claim was £300.

LAST SATURDAY THE COURT for the consideration of Crown Cases Reserved decided a point of some importance as to the meaning of the word "forge" in the criminal law. The prisoner owned certain land, and he gave an equitable mortgage of it to the prosecutor. He afterwards became insolvent, and executed a deed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, conveying all his property, real and personal, to a trustee for his creditors. Subsequently he joined with the trustee in the execution of a deed conveying the legal estate of the land to the prosecutor. A little later he executed a deed which purported to grant a long lease of the land to his son. This deed purported to bear date before the execution of either of the before-mentioned deeds. The prisoner was indicted for forging under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 20, which contains no definition of forgery. The jury found in effect that the deed was knowingly antedated with a fraudulent intent to cheat the prosecutor. It was argued for the prisoner that no forgery had been committed, as the deed was really executed by the persons by whom it purported to be executed, and that the mere false statement of the date could not constitute forgery. There was no modern decision upon the point, although some of the modern text writers seem to include such a case within their definitions of forgery. The Court held that the offence was forgery; but they pointed out that a false statement in an instrument, although fraudulently inserted, does not necessarily amount to a forgery, but if the instrument itself is false—that is, if it purports to be that what it is not—then the making of it may be a forgery. Here the date was the very essence of the deed, and it was proved that the date was fraudulently inserted, the crime of forgery was therefore committed, as the deed was undoubtedly a false deed, and not merely a deed containing a false statement.

THE FATE THIS WEEK of a petition to wind up a concern called Spence's Patent Non-conducting Composition Company deserves a note. The petition was a shareholders' petition, and the Master of the Rolls, in whose court it was filed, did not consider that the petitioning shareholders had made out a case for winding up. There appeared, however, in support of the petition, an unpaid creditor. Now, an unpaid creditor who has an unsatisfied judgment, or who has made the formal demand mentioned in section 60 of the Companies Act, 1862, has a right, almost if not quite ex debito justitiæ, to a winding-up order on his own petition. The Master of the Rolls in this case doubted whether he ought not to make the winding-up order and give the carriage to the creditor in question. He decided on not doing so, because he thought it not fair to the company to turn a shareholders' petition into a creditors' petition on so short a notice, the respondents, of course, having come into court prepared to meet only the former. The petition was therefore dismissed with costs, with, of course, the result that the creditor who had appeared had to pay his own costs of so doing. Had he petitioned himself he would in all probability have obtained his order.

THE OPERATION OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1869, ON VOLUNTARY AND OTHER SETTLEMENTS.

NO. I.

The object of the following remarks is to discuss the alterations in the law relating to voluntary and other settlements by the 91st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which Act comes into operation on the 1st of January, 1870. This section is as follows:—

"Any settlement of property made by a trader not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of such settlement, be void as against the trustee of the bankruptcy appointed under this Act, and shall if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of such settlement, unless the parties claiming under such settlement can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in such settlement, be void against such trustee. Any covenant or contract made by a trader in consideration of marriage for the future settlement upon, or for his wife or children of any money or property wherein he had not at the date of his marriage, any estate or interest, whether vested, reversionary, or contingent, in possession or remainder, and not being money or property of or in right of his wife shall upon his becoming bankrupt before such property or money has been actually transferred or paid pursuant to such contract or covenant be void against his trustee appointed under this Act. "Settlement" shall for the purposes of this section include any conveyance or transfer of property."

In order to ascertain the scope of this section it will be desirable to consider first, in accordance with the well-known canon of interpretation, the old law, and the mischief, and then the remedy. It will be observed then that the section applies only to two classes of settlements, —first, and chiefly, to voluntary settlements; and, secondly, to ante-nuptial settlements, so far as they consist of covenants for the future settlement upon and for wife and children of any money or property not being money or property of or in right of his wife, wherein the settlor had not at the date of his marriage any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent. Again, it must be noticed that the section applies only to settlements by traders within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, as set forth in the first schedule thereto.

The old law with respect to a covenant or contract in an ante-nuptial settlement, by the husband, to settle future property, is briefly this:—if the husband covenants to pay to the trustees a certain sum of money, to be held by them upon trusts for his wife and family and afterwards becomes bankrupt, the trustees can prove under the bankruptcy for the full amount, if payable on demand, or the actual value for the time being, if payable at any fixed future period. If the husband covenants to settle property which he may subsequently acquire, then, if the covenant refers to specific property, or if property is acquired with the intention of satisfying the covenant, a lien on such property is created by the covenant; but, under any other circumstances, in the case of the bankruptcy of the husband before the satisfaction of the covenant the trustees are only entitled to come in as creditors under the bankruptcy.

The old law with respect to voluntary settlements is deducible from the two well-known statutes, the 13 of Eliz. c. 5, and the 27 of Eliz. c. 4, with the many cases that have been decided thereon. That law may be briefly stated thus:—Any voluntary settlement of real property is void under the latter of the two statutes against a subsequent purchaser for value, whether such purchaser had or had not notice of the existence of the settlement at the time of the purchase; every voluntary settlement of any species of property is void under the former of the two statutes if "contrived to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors and others." The construction placed upon that statute is, that if prior creditors can prove that their remedies were, as events happened, delayed or hindered by the post-nuptial settlement, they can upset it; that when a settlement is upset, subsequent creditors come in pari passu with prior creditors; and that a subsequent creditor can file a bill to upset a settlement when any prior debt remains unpaid. Whether a subsequent creditor has any equity to file a bill to upset a settlement under the 13 of Eliz. c. 5, whether any prior debts remain unpaid or not, or when there were no prior debts at all is still unsettled; but the writer of a recent treatise on the subject appears to think that under certain circumstances he can.

Such being the old law, what was the mischief? A very considerable one. A man was able by covenanting in an ante-nuptial settlement to pay a sum of money after the marriage to the trustees of the settlement, or to put property of a specified value into settlement, to enable the trustees to prove under his bankruptcy in the event of his becoming bankrupt, and thus to defraud his creditors and indirectly to secure a provision for himself out of his own property. Again, it is not too much to say that a vast amount of injustice, nay, more of rascality, has been perpetrated by means of post-nuptial settlements, and this is especially true in the commercial world. When a man realises any money by legitimate trading or speculation, or obtains any property by gift or inheritance, he often, by means of a post-nuptial settlement, settles it upon his wife and family. Although, in the eye of the law, it ceases to be his, yet he continues to obtain credit upon the strength of it, even if he does not actually employ it in his business; but when he becomes bankrupt, in all probability his creditors cannot touch it. Of course, it is open to them to upset the settlement under the 13 of Eliz. c. 5, but then upon them rests the burden of proving that the settlement was contrived to "delay, hinder, or defraud" them. If they can show that the settler was insolvent at the time he executed the settlement or rendered himself insolvent thereby, the proof is easy; but if they cannot the proof is so difficult that it is often treated as impossible.

At last, matters arrived at such a crisis, and the demand for an alteration in the law became so imperative, that the Legislature took the matter up; but, instead of bringing in a short Act to remedy the mischief, they, with that piecemeal legislation that is so objectionable, inserted a clause in the Bankruptcy Act of last session, and that clause has now to be considered.

In the first place, the clause applies only, as before stated, to settlements executed by "traders" within the meaning of the Act. Traders are defined by the first schedule thereto as follows:—

"Alum makers, apothecaries, auctioneers, bankers, bleachers, brokers, brickmakers, builders, calenderers, carpenters, carriers, cattle or sheep salesmen, coach proprietors, cowkeepers, dyers, fullers, keepers of inn taverns, hotels, or coffee houses, lime burners, livery stable keepers, market gardeners, millers, packers, printers, sharebrokers, shipowners, shipwrights, stockbrokers, stockjobbers, victuallers, warehousemen, wharfingers, persons using the trade or profession of a scrivener receiving other men's money or estates into their trust or custody, persons insuring ships or their freight, or other matters against perils of the sea, persons using the trade of merchandise by way of bargaining, exchange, bartering, commission, consignment, or otherwise, in gross or by retail, and persons who either for themselves or as agents or factors for others seek their living by buying or selling, or buying and letting for hire, goods or commodities, or by workmanship or the conversion of goods or commodities, but a farmer, grazier, common labourer, or workman for hire shall not nor shall a member of any partnership, association, or company which cannot be adjudged bankrupt under this Act be deemed as such a trader for the purposes of this Act."

So that settlements made by barristers, solicitors, physicians, clergymen, and persons not engaged in any trade or profession, do not fall within the scope of this section, and will continue to be governed by the old law. Why there should be one law governing the settlements of traders and another governing those of non-traders it is impossible to see. The distinction, such as it is, was not in the bill originally, was not in the amendment proposed and carried by Mr. Rathbone, but was introduced into the measure by the House of Lords. When further legislation comes—and it probably will come upon this subject—this distinction ought certainly to be abolished.

EQUITY.

PENALTY—MORTGAGE TO BUILDING SOCIETY.

Matterson v. Elderfield, L.C., 17 W. R. 422.

The Court of Equity never enforces a penalty or forfeiture (Story, s. 1319), and the Court relieves against almost all penalties except statutory ones, but it will not relieve unless it can put the other party into as good a condition as if there had been no breach made (Rose v. Rose, 1 Amb. 331). It is often a difficult question to determine what is a penalty and what is not, so as to decide upon which side of the line some particular stipulation falls; and no rigid definition can be laid down which should meet the innumerable cases constantly arising. As Lord Maclesfield put it in the leading case of Peachy v. Duke of Somerset (1 Stra. 447, 2 Wh. & Tu. L. C.), the true foundation of the equitable jurisdiction to relieve is from the original intent of the case, and when the Court can give a party, by way of recompense, all that he expected or desired. In most of the doubtful cases an effective test is—was that against which relief is asked imposed for securing the performance of an agreement to do a certain act, or was it stipulated for as the price for doing, or refraining from doing, a certain act (Wh. & Tu. L. C., ubi sup.)? This is what is meant by distinguishing cases as cases of penalty or of mere contract, an expression which sometimes puzzles the student, who wonders how such a distinction can be drawn, seeing that in every case a contract is involved—even in the simplest case of a bond with penal sum.

If a creditor agrees to take less than his debt, provided such reduced sum be paid by a certain day, and the debtor makes default on that day, the Court will not relieve him against the consequences of being remitted back to his original debt (Ex parte Bennet, 2 Atk. 527). But where the stipulation has been for a mortgage to secure the lesser sum, a very difficult question may arise as to the consequences of the ordinary default in discharging the mortgage money on the day named in the mortgage deed. This very question arose in Thompson v. Hudson (15 W. R. 697, L. R. 3 Ch. 255); and unfortunately, in consequence, perhaps, of the complication of the facts, the Court of Appeal differed upon the essential question in the case. In that case there was an agreement to provide, partly by cash payment and partly by mortgage, a certain sum less than the debt, upon which the creditor was to execute a release for the whole amount; but if the debtor failed to perform the agreement the creditor was to be remitted to his original right. The payments were made and the mortgage executed, but the mortgage-deed contained a stipulation that if the mortgage-money were not paid on the day named in the deed the creditor should revert to his original debt. The mortgage-money was not paid on the day specified in the deed, and the question arose, was the smaller or the larger sum now recoverable by the creditor. The Master of the Rolls held the smaller, regarding the transaction as a mortgage to secure a certain sum, with a stipulation that, on default, a larger sum should be recoverable. On that construction such a stipulation would, of course, be penal. Lord Chelmsford affirmed the Master of the Rolls, but on another ground; he held that the stipulation in the mortgage-deed reviving the original debt was ultra the original agreement, which itself was indisputably legitimate and equitable. But Lord Justice Turner thought that the larger sum was recoverable by the creditor, considering the case as of one entire agreement. That is no doubt the real question in the case—was or was not the stipulation inserted in the mortgage deed to be considered part of the original agreement, for if it had been expressly stated in the original agreement that on default of mortgage-money on the day named in the deed the original debt should be recoverable such a stipulation would have been undoubtedly valid in equity.

A similar question of construction has sometimes arisen in the case of mortgages made by members of building societies. The terms exacted by these societies of their borrowing members are generally very hard; hence the numerous instances in which relief has been sought by mortgagors, as against a penalty. Generally, however, it turns out that the case is not one of penalty, but of a mere stipulation, against which no relief can be had.

In Parker v. Butcher (L. R. 3 Eq. 762, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 22) the rules imposed a fine at the rate of one shilling per pound per month, on default in paying the monthly contributions or instalments, by which principal and interest were to be discharged; and the Master of the Rolls held that these fines were not within the equitable doctrine of relief against penalties, and refused to allow the mortgagor to redeem without paying them; he would not, however, allow them to bear interest, holding that that would be to give compound interest. In the present case the rules provided that a member redeeming his mortgage beforehand should be allowed a rebate upon the future instalments which he thus paid in advance, which, of course, he ought to have, those instalments professedly including interest. The mortgage-deed, in pursuance of another rule, contained a power of sale exercisable on a certain default in paying the monthly instalments; under this power the purchase-money was to be applied in payment of all the moneys due or to become due for subscriptions and fines, and no mention was made of any rebate. The assignees of a bankrupt mortgagor against whom this compulsory power of sale had been exercised claimed that in equity there ought to be a rebate, but Lord Hatherley, reversing Vice-Chancellor Giffard, held that as the rule gave none, the mortgagor, having contracted for none, could claim none, and that the case was not one of a penalty but of a plain contract against which equity could not relieve.

There are three older cases—viz., Mosley v. Baker, 6 Ha. 87; Fleming v. Self, 3 D. M. & G. 997; and Smith v. Pilkington, 1 D. F. & J. 135, which are usually cited in these cases. They are however scarcely relevant to the present case.

THE "GARNISHEE CLAUSES" OF THE COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT, 1854, INAPPLICABLE TO THE DEBTOR'S EQUITABLE INTEREST.

Horsley v. Cox, L.C., 17 W. R. 596.

This is a decision which common law practitioners should note up against the Common Law Procedure Acts, deciding, as it does, once for all, that the Court of Equity will not assist a judgment-creditor to make available against an equitable interest belonging to his debtor, the "garnishee" clauses of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

It is a rule of equity that where nothing but a legal obstacle of form prevents the recovery of a right, the Court of Equity will interfere at the instance of the person entitled, and, by setting aside the formal obstacle, assist him to obtain his right. The case where an outstanding term obstructed the creditor was once a familiar instance of this; but since the Act putting an end to unsatisfied terms, and since the Judgment-Creditor's Acts (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110) and subsequently, this instance is rarer. Under the Judgment Acts the judgment is made a charge against equitable interest; but an equitable interest in land cannot be reached by elegit, and so the Court of Equity will assist the judgment-creditor to make the debtor's equitable interest available for his judgment. It requires him, however, to pursue his remedy at law to the uttermost, before seeking the aid of Equity, even to the length of getting the sheriff's return to his writ, though that return must to moral certainty be "nulla bona." In Thornton v. Finch (4 Giff. 515), the debtor's interest was an equity of redemption, and, the mortgagee being about to sell, a judgment-creditor obtained an injunction to restrain him from paying the surplus purchase-money to the mortgagor. In Bennett v. Powell (3 W. R. 618, 3 Drew. 326), a cestui que trust was entitled to a sum charged upon leaseholds, and Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, upon a bill filed by a creditor claiming under a county court judgment, ordered the trustees to pay the amount. (Harris v. Davison, 15 Sim. 528, and Gore v. Bowser, 3 W. R. 430, cited in the principal case were similar instances.)

cedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 60—66), empower the creditor who has obtained a judgment in any of the superior courts (which by the interpretation clause are to mean the Courts of Common Law), to examine his debtor as to all moneys owing to the debtor, and afterwards obtain a garnishee order calling on the debtors' debtor to show cause why he should not pay the judgment-creditor.

In Horsley v. Cox these provisions were of no avail to the judgment-creditor, because the debtor had nothing but an interest as a cestui que trust in the profits of a business. Lord Hatherley held that the garnishee clauses of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, were not within the doctrine of equitable aid above mentioned. He considered that their provisions pointed exclusively to common law remedies and proceedings, observing inter alia that money due from a trustee to a cestui que trust could not be considered a "debt" within the meaning of section 61, and that there was not, as in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, any special clause applying the procedure to courts of equity.

COMMON LAW.

COPYRIGHT.

Ex parte Walker, Q. B., 17 W. R. 1018.

This case has decided several important questions relating to copyright. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68, s. 1, creates a copyright in original paintings, drawings, and photographs. Section 4 requires the registration of a memorandum of every copyright, and of all subsequent assignments thereof, and no proprietor of a copyright is entitled to the benefit of the Act until such registration.

By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, which is partially incorporated with 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68, certified copies of entries in the register are made prima facie evidence of the proprietorship of the registered owner, and it is also provided that any person who may "deem himself aggrieved" by any entry in the register may apply to the Court to have such entry expunged or varied.

The applicant in Ex parte Walker had been convicted of an infringement of Mr. Graves' copyright (which was registered) in certain pictures. At the hearing of the case Mr. Graves' ownership was proved by certified copies of the entries in the register.

Walker subsequently applied to the Court to have these entries varied or expunged, on the ground that Mr. Graves' title was not complete, and that, therefore, he ought not to remain on the register as the proprietor of the copyright in question. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, gives the right to make an application of this sort only to "a person aggrieved" by any entry.

The objections raised to Mr. Graves' title were—first, that there could be no copyright in a photograph of a picture; secondly, that the original assignment of the copyright to Mr. Graves was not registered. Walker did not claim any interest in or title to the copyright in question. His complaint was that as he had been convicted on the evidence of the entries, he was aggrieved by such entry if Mr. Graves was not entitled to be registered as proprietor of the copyright.

These points were decided against Walker, and the application was refused. It was held that there may be a copyright in a photograph of a picture, also that the fact that there have been unregistered assignments of a copyright prior to its first registration does not invalidate such registration, as the statute only requires that all assignments subsequent to such registration shall be registered.

This view of these points rendered it unnecessary to decide whether Walker was a "person aggrieved" within the statute. All the judges, however, agreed that Walker was not a "person aggrieved," and the case is thus in effect as much an authority upon this as upon the other question.

It seems very difficult to define what persons come within the description of "persons aggrieved" by an entry in the register. The judgment of Hannen, J., contains an explanation of the meaning of this expression, and this explanation seems to agree with the opinion of the other members of the Court. Hannen, J., says the only person who has a right to make this application "is one who can show that the entry is inconsistent with some right which he sets up in himself or other persons or circumstances from which the Court could see that the entry would in some way inconvenience the applicant; for instance, if a person had an intention of making copies of the work and dared not do so while the entry existed, the Court might entertain that if they thought it bonâ fide. In this case the application is only to raise a question of a technical character which the applicant can raise otherwise, and the Court ought not to grant this application."

* For some notice of the late cases under these confused and ill-drawn Acts, see 13 S. J. 811.

In considering the effect of this case as an authority on this point, it will be necessary to weigh well the effect of this sentence in the judgment of Hannen, J.

ASSIGNMENT OF DEBENTURES—SET OFF—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

Higgs v. Northern Assam Tea Company, Ex., 17 W. R. 1125.

The old rule of the common law, that a chose in action cannot be assigned, is constantly clashing with the everyday practice by which chooses in action are in fact assigned. Such assignments, in strict theory, give no legal right to the assignee, although they have long been recognised in equity. The assignee can, however, in fact, obtain a recognition of his rights at law by bringing an action in the name of the assignor. This course has the disadvantage that it enables the defendant to set up in the action any defence which he may have against the assignor, such as set-off in an action for a debt, even although such set-off is entirely collateral to the chose in action sued upon. The defendant may have so acted as to have debarred himself from the right of relying on a set-off, but the general rule is as above stated.

An important modification of the legal rights of a defendant sued by an assignee of his creditor's debt was created by Dickson v. The Swansea, &c., Railway Company (17 W. R. 51). There the defendants gave a Lloyd's bond to the plaintiff, who agreed at the same time that he would see that the bond was paid at maturity. The bond was given to the plaintiff for the purpose of being assigned to raise money. The plaintiff assigned the bond, and the assignee sued the defendants in the plaintiff's name. The defendants pleaded a set-off against the plaintiff. The plaintiff replied these facts; and the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, on the ground that, as the bond was given for the purpose of being assigned, it would be inequitable to allow the defendants to set up a defence which would deprive the assignee of any benefit under the assignment. "By the defendants' act the plaintiff had been enabled to deceive the parties who advanced the money; and, having by that means got the money from them, was now in the position of a trustee suing on their behalf," and his claim as such trustee was not subject to the set-off.

In Higgs v. The Northern Assam, &c., Company this principle has been followed. The defendants issued debentures payable to the plaintiff and his assigns. The plaintiff assigned them. The defendants in various ways subsequently recognised the assignees as the owners of the debentures. It was taken as a fact in the decision of the case that, from collateral facts as well as from their form, it was intended that the debentures should be assigned. It was held, in an action by the assignees in the plaintiff's name, that the defendants could not avail themselves of a set-off against the plaintiff.

There were two distinct grounds on which this decision might have been based—viz., on the fact that the defendants intended that the debentures should be assigned, or on their subsequent dealings with the assignees. The judgment appears to have been based upon the two grounds together, and does not very clearly point out the weight which was attached to each of these considerations separately. The Court say—"Both parties must have contemplated these debentures would be assigned, but as they could not practically be sold and assigned if subject to an uncertain set-off against the plaintiff, both he and the defendants must have intended that in the hands of transferees they should not be subject to that set-off." The judgment then examines the dealings between the assignees and the defendants subsequent to the assignment, the legal result of which depends of course upon the special circumstances of the case.

This case and Dickson v. The Vale, &c., Railway Company furnish some authority for the proposition, that where a defendant has given bonds, debentures, or other similar instruments to the plaintiff with the intention that such instruments shall be assigned, he is not allowed in an action on the instruments by assignees in the plaintiff's name to set up a set-off against, or collateral agreement with, the plaintiff, or other similar defence arising from matters wholly collateral to such instruments and not appearing upon the face of them. These cases are, however, open to the observation that it does not clearly appear that this was the sole ratio decidendi in either of them. In Dickson v. The Vale, &c., Railway Company the setting up by the defendants of their agreement with the plaintiff as a defence to the action was a fraud on the assignees; and in Higgs v. The Northern Assam, &c., Company there were other grounds for the decision. It seems likely, however, that the proposition we have mentioned will be declared to be law whenever the point requires decision. In these remarks we have used the term "assignees" as signifying bonâ fide assignees for value without notice. If an assignee has notice of a set-off, &c., an entirely different question may be raised.

REVIEWS.

The Law of Carriers of Goods and Passengers, Private and Public, Inland and Foreign, by Railway, Steamboat, and other Modes of Transportation; also the Construction, Responsibility, and Duty of Telegraph Companies, the Responsibility and Duty of Innkeepers, and the Law of Bailments of every Class, embracing Remedies. By ISAAC F. REDFIELD, LL.D. H. O. Houghton & Co., Cambridge, Mass., and Hurd & Houghton, New York. 1869.

We have given at full length the title of this work. It might be assumed, on reading it, that, as the author tells us is really the case, the work has outgrown the original design. Having given, with considerable detail, the law applicable to particular bailments of common occurrence, he thought that he had so nearly exhausted the subject of bailments that it was desirable to make the work include the whole subject. This has been done by adding at the end of the book certain chapters dealing with the general subject. We should have thought it a more artistic arrangement to have given first the general law of bailments, and then to have passed on to deal with the specific instances. As it is, the whole of the first part relating to private carriers might certainly have been included in that dealing with the general law of bailments, while, even in the part relating to public carriers, the general propositions, which are to come at the end, have necessarily to be anticipated—e.g., by the note at page 17. We should have thought that the alteration in the original designs of the work might have been carried out thus almost as easily and much better than in the way the author has adopted.

There is, however, at all events, one person who not only is thoroughly well satisfied with this work as it stands, a feeling he perhaps shares with many authors, but who is, as is less common, not the least ashamed of saying so. Mr. Redfield tells us in his preface that—

"Unless he is in some way led into misapprehension in regard to the readableness and utility of this work, it will be found an agreeable and valuable text-book, as well as a reliable digest of the leading cases upon all the topics discussed."

Again, in the general introduction,— to secure accuracy and completeness, and, at the same time, with such a conspicuous and simple arrangement, and so perfect an index, as to enable everyone to find at once all that shall be desired upon all the topics treated. It is hoped and believed such will be found to be the results; and that it will, on these accounts, be found greatly useful both to the professional and unprofessional who may desire to consult it, and especially so to students."

Not only do we find in these and in other passages a tone of self-assertion to which we are somewhat unaccustomed in writers of English law books, but we notice also a tendency to declamation on general subjects, which is, perhaps, characteristic of the nationality of the author. Thus he is very eloquent on the subject of railway management and responsibility, and admires greatly the German railways on which there are signalmen "whose sole employment is to know that all is right on the advancing line, and to bow the trains along by the graceful touch of the hat as they pass." In reference to innkeepers, he notices at some length their habit of making exorbitant charges. This he tells us is inherent in the nature of the business, though unfortunately no legal treatise and no legislation can be expected to remedy it. Upon the question how far the captain of a passenger ship is justified in excluding from the cabin a passenger on the ground of ungentlemanly manners or conduct, he tells us that

If we were to come across writing of this sort in an English law book, we should be apt to suspect the writer of being somewhat superficial and hasty in his conclusions, and to think his work the less reliable in consequence. Probably, however, it would be unfair to do so in the present instance, and certainly if there were any chance that the work would meet with non-professional readers, as Mr. Redfield appears to think it will, the frequent occurrence of passages of this sort would be likely to make it more entertaining to them. Before passing on to the legal merits of the work we may notice a somewhat amusing use of the editorial "we." After criticising somewhat severely a decision of the court of Pennsylvania, and charitably expressing a hope that "there is some apology for the decision which does not occur to us as resulting from the general principles involved in the case," the author says, "we recollect, while exercising the office of Chancellor in Vermont, to have made a peremptory order against our clerk of the court," etc., the order of course differing in principle from that made in Pennsylvania.

By far the greater part of the work is that which deals with the law of common carriers, and of this a very considerable portion is devoted to the cases as to carriers of passengers. The whole of this is certainly coloured by the very strong views which the writer takes as to the extent to which railway companies and other carriers ought to be made liable. He considers that the common sense instincts of juries have raised them to a higher plane of wisdom and justice than that which the courts or the profession have yet attained. Starting in this way, it is easy to see what views he would take upon all cases where the liability of the railway company was debateable. He does not, indeed, hold that there is not the difference usually supposed to exist between the cases of carriers of goods and carriers of passengers—viz., that in the one case the carrier is an insurer, in the other he is not. He insists, however, that the difference is rather formal than substantial. We do not find that the recent case of Redhead v. The Midland Railway is noticed at all in this volume. It is probable that the report of the case in the Exchequer Chamber would not have reached the author in time for publication, as he notices the report of the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Siner and Wife v. The Great Western Railway, in 17 W. R. 417, as just come to hand after he had written some remarks upon that case in the court below. The decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Redhead's case was reported 17 W. R. 737, and probably, therefore, was just too late to be noticed. The decision of the Queen's Bench in Redhead's case was, however, given more than two years ago, and it is a little curious that it should not have been dealt with. As our readers no doubt remember, the American authorities were much discussed, and it was argued from various decided cases, especially Alden v. The New York Central Railway Company (12 Smith, 102), that the American rule was, that although the carrier did not insure the safety of his passengers, yet that he did warrant his vehicles as roadworthy. Mr. Redfield, however, appears not to have paid much attention to the case of Alden v. The New York Central Railway, which he only notices incidentally, and quotes once from a report in the Railway Times; nor does he draw the distinction between the cases in which it was held that there was such a warranty and the other cases in which the liability was based upon negligence. He does, however, hold to the doctrine that the carrier is responsible for the negligence of the manufacturer, as well as that of his servants. It will be remembered that in Redhead's case it was not necessary to decide this point, as negligence on the part of the manufacturer of the carriage, as well as on the part of the railway company, was negatived by the finding of the jury. Mr. Redfield, however, lays down the rule broadly, that the smallest amount of negligence is sufficient to make the company liable.

He especially approves the opinions of Chief Baron Kelly and Mr. Justice Keating in dissenting from the opinion of the majority of the judges in the Exchequer and Exchequer Chamber respectively in the case of Siner and Wife v. The Great Western Railway (ubi sup.), and says that the true rule in such cases would seem to be that where any arrangement connected with passenger transportation was admitted by being afforded to be a necessary convenience for the security or comfort of the passengers, it should be the duty of carriers to afford it to all as far as practicable. We have said enough to show that the circulation of this work in this country is little likely to be promoted by railway companies. For any one, however, who has to establish the liability of a company under novel circumstances, we do not know a book to which he could refer with greater hope of success in finding arguments, and probably cases, to help him. This applies not only to cases of personal injuries, but also to cases of delay, as to which the author repudiates the rule recently established in England as to the damages recoverable in such cases. He does not seem to have seen the most recent English case on the subject (Woodger v. The Great Western Railway, 15 W. R. 383), but he criticises severely the previous one of Hamlin v. The Great Northern Railway, 1 H. & N. 408.

In two other instances besides that of Redhead's case Mr. Redfield is unfortunate, in the fact that cases of importance on subjects which he has dealt with at some length have been decided and reported in England just too late for him to notice them. One of these is Painford v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company, 17 W. R. 968; the other Giblin v. McMullin, 17 W. R. 445.

In Painford v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company the Court of Queen's Bench in England have definitely decided that only the person making the contract with the telegraph company can sue them for an error in transmitting it. This would usually be the sender of the message, though, of course, there might be cases where the sender was a mere agent of the receiver, and then of course the receiver could sue. In America, however, it has been held that the sender of the message, supposing him to send it on his own behalf, may sue on the contract, and the receiver may also sue as for a breach of duty. This doctrine appears to have been laid down in several cases but most distinctly in The New York and Washington Telegraph Company v. Dryburgh, 35 Penn. St. 298. This case Mr. Redfield expressly approves of, while the Court of Queen's Bench here have equally decidedly declined to follow it. This, therefore, is a case in which, in a matter of pure principle, and not one depending upon statute law or anything of that kind, the law in this country and in America is different. It would be interesting to see how Mr. Redfield would have treated the English decision.

The case of Giblin v. McMullin (17 W. R. 445), in the Privy Council, decided that a bank with whom securities had been deposited were not liable for their having been stolen by the cashier. The same thing had previously been decided upon an almost identical state of facts in Foster v. The Essex Bank (17 Mass. Rep. 478). This case was quoted before the Privy Council and approved of by them in their judgment. Mr. Redfield, however, though he approves of the statement of the law in Foster v. The Essex Bank, discusses at some length, and manifestly disapproves of the application there made of the law to the facts. This, again, is a case in which we should have been glad to see how Mr. Redfield would deal with the English decision.

In these instances Mr. Redfield has been 'unfortunate, by reason of the time of his publication. He has, however, shown considerable diligence in incorporating recent English decisions as well as American. This, however, seems to have been done rather rapidly, and in some instances, either by slip of the author or his printer, the references are so given as rather to confuse. Thus, at page 240, Buckle v. Knoop (L. R. 2 Ex. 125 and 333) is quoted in support of a proposition really contained in Sandeman v. Scurr (L. R. 2 Q. B. 86; the latter case is quoted for a proposition really contained in Hudson v. Ede (L. R. 2 Q. B. 566), and the latter case is referred to for something which we imagine is really contained in some other part of Mr. Redfield's work to which, however, no reference is given.

So far our criticism may appear somewhat unfavourable, but we do not desire to leave our readers under the impression that the work is not a valuable one. When once the reader is told that the work is somewhat coloured by the strong views held by the author, he is forewarned, and the defect, if it is one, is cured. Mr. Redfield always advances strong, and sometimes conclusive, arguments in favour of his views. The freedom and vigour of his criticism upon decided cases not according to his views is such as is not often met with, and his remarks must be most useful whenever those cases have to be reconsidered.

As a storehouse from which to draw forcible arguments upon cases within its scope, this volume will be most useful, though in forming an opinion as to many of such cases its guidance should not perhaps be followed implicitly, nor until the statements of the author have been dealt with as those of an advocate would be and thoroughly sifted.

A Practical Guide to the Bankruptcy Law of 1869; being the Bankruptcy and Debtors Acts, 1869, condensed and simplified, with notes, reference tables, and index. By JOSEPH SEYMOUR SALAMAN, Solicitor. London: Groombridge & Son. 1869.

Any book appearing at present which pretended to be a complete treatise on bankruptcy law, founded on the recent legislation upon this subject, would be received by all sensible people with suspicion, or something more than suspicion. But a book, like the present, which makes no false pretensions to the character of a complete treatise, but simply professes to arrange and index the clauses of the Acts in question, is of great utility, and deserves a very different reception.

The sections of the Bankruptcy Act appear to us to have been well arranged and judiciously compressed by Mr. Salaman; and his indexes will be of much use to anyone who has to refer to the Act.

The Law Magazine and Law Review. November, 1869. No. LV. New series. London: Butterworths.

The Law Magazine has an averagely interesting number this quarter. The article which possesses most interest is, we think, one on Patent Law Reform, a subject which was brought before the House of Commons last session, by Mr. Macfie, M.P., and will probably be brought up again before long. The writer of this article is opposed to the erection of a "Patent Court," but recommends the employment of assessors in patent cases. The number also contains articles on the Penal Code of New York, on Primogeniture, Imprisonment for Debt, Foreign Debtors in England, the Irish Land Question, the Turnpike System, Naturalization and Allegiance, Rights of Colonial Legislatures, and State Appropriation of Railways. In addition to these, there is a digest of Scotch Court of Session cases, and the usual summary of events of the quarter, and reviews. Some of the articles are well worth reading; the reviews appear to us the least able portion of the number.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

LORD JUSTICE.

Practice as to Appeals direct from Chambers.

An application was made on Friday, the 12th inst., to Lord Justice Giffard, to allow an appeal to be heard in a case which had been argued in chambers before the judge himself, who declined to have it re-argued in court.

GIFFARD, L.J., said that he thought the most convenient rule to lay down for the future would be that no appeal should be allowed to be brought direct from chambers, unless the judge of the court below should certify that the matter had been so fully discussed before him in chambers that he did not wish to have it re-argued in court.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Business of the Court.

The Court will sit in banco after term on Friday, the 26th, Saturday, the 27th, and Monday, the 29th November; and on Monday, December 13, for the purpose of delivering judgments only.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

(Before Sir R. PHILLIMORE.)

Nov. 9.—The "Young James."

The Admiralty County Court Act, 1869.

A plaintiff suing in the superior court is entitled to costs if more than £300 was claimed, although less than £300 was recovered.

In this case his Lordship gave judgment this day. The action was brought for a collision at Yarmouth, and £800 was claimed for the damage. The defendants paid £248 into court, which was accepted, and the question was whether, as under £300 was recovered, the plaintiff could recover costs.

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendant, insisted that as the claim was beyond £300, the limit of the new Act, the plaintiffs were entitled to costs.

Gibson, for the plaintiffs, urged that if that were so, any one could oust the jurisdiction of the court by claiming above £300, and that the sum actually recovered was the claim.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE held that, as the claim made was beyond £300, the plaintiffs were entitled to costs, although only £248 was recovered.

Judgment accordingly.

The "Ino."

The right of the Crown to sue in any Court.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane) applied, on the part of the Lords of the Admiralty, to proceed in the High Court of Admiralty, instead of a county court, to recover damages for a collision with one of her Majesty's ships, called the Davutless, although the estimate of damage was under £300. The point raised an important question. He maintained that the Crown had a right to proceed in any court unless a court was specifically named. The new County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act provided that claims not exceeding £300 should be brought in the High Court.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE ordered the suit on behalf of the Crown to be commenced in this court.

SOUTHWARK.

(Before C. S. WHITMORE, Esq., Q.C.)

Nov. 11.—Metropolis Local Management Acts, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and 25 & 26 Vict., c. 102.

The remedies for obtaining contributions from owners for paving new streets under section 217 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and sections 77 and 96 of the 25 & 26 Vict., c. 102 are alternative and not cumulative.

A vestry having obtained a judgment against a contributory owner, which judgment, through the insolvency of the judgment-debtor turned out to be valueless,

Held, that the vestry could not, under section 96 of the last-named statute, recover against a subsequent assignee for value of the property, through his tenant, for the contribution in respect of which the judgment was obtained.

To make the amount of the contribution operate as a charge upon the property together with the costs of obtaining the judgment, the proceedings pointed out by the Registration Statutes, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38; and 27 & 28 Vict., c. 112, should have been taken by the vestry.

Under the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, ss. 105, 217, vestries and local boards were empowered to pave new streets, and adjudge the proportions in which the owners of adjacent property should contri- bute to the expense thereof. By the Amendment Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, ss. 77, 96, power was conferred to sue for such contributions "any present or future owner," or their tenants, and the latter were to pay the amount of the contribution to the vestry, and deduct the same from the rent payable to their landlords.

In 1866, the vestry of Bermondsey paved a new street in that parish, and adjudged Mr. Soper, the owner of a house therein, to contribute the sum of £38 5s. 4d. towards the expense thereof, this he agreed to pay in three instalments but, making default, was sued by the vestry and suffered a judgment. Afterwards, Mr. Soper became insolvent, and the vestry were unable to realise anything under their judgment. Subsequent to the judgment being recovered, Mr. Milner, the mortgagee of the property, sold to Mr. Herbert, and in 1869 the defendant, the tenant of the purchaser Herbert, received notice from the vestry to pay her rent over to them under section 96 of the later Act, until the amount of the debt upon which the judgment was obtained (exclusive, however, of the costs of obtaining the judgment) was satisfied. This she declined to do, and hence the present action was brought for the sum of £38 5s. 4d. parcel of the judgment debt, and which sum was admitted to be identical with the contribution for which Mr. Soper had been sued.

E. Thomas, for the plaintiff.—The intention of the statutes was that the property that had benefited should bear the liability in the hands of the then present or any future owner—the remedy against the then present owner having proved barren, the vestry were justified in following the land into the hands of a future owner, on the analogy of the holder of a bill of exchange suing in succession the parties liable thereon.

S. Poynter, for the defendant.—This is res judicata. The remedies are alternative and not cumulative. The vestry had the power to sue the present, "or any future owner." They have exercised their right of election and have chosen to sue an owner in presenti, and have recovered a judgment against him, thereby the statutory contract is extinguished, a merger is wrought and a contract of record established. At all events, they should have exhausted every remedy against the original debtor before they came upon an innocent purchaser for value. Now they have not issued and registered execution so as to charge the land and whereby subsequent purchasers would have bought with notice, as they might have done in the mode pointed out by the Legislature in 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38 and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112. Again, a judgment for the plaintiff in this action would not discharge the judgment they already possess against Soper. The law did not regard the value of judgments. If the plaintiffs recovered in this action they would possess two judgments in respect of the same debt. The analogy of a bill of exchange did not hold where the remedy was given by the statute, and must be strictly construed according to its language.

Mr. WHITMORE said that on the principle transit in rem judicatam his judgment must be given for the defendant. He thought this was res judicata, but the language of the statute was so involved that he confessed he entertained some doubts, and thought the question one eminently adapted for a higher judicial decision, as very important interests were concerned in an authoritative exposition of these statutes, and many analogous cases might be imagined where similar doubts would arise. One thing, however, would seem clear in the present instance, that the vestry had not done all in their power to render the judgment against Soper productive, and they would probably from this decision receive a wholesome warning which would be useful to them at a future time.

Judgment for the defendant.

THE WINE AND BEER ACT.—A defect in the new Wine and Beer Act has been discovered at Ashton-under-Lyne. Under the 16th section of the Act, any person present in a house open at illegal hours is liable to a penalty specified; but it was held in a case before the Ashton magistrates on Monday, that when persons during the prohibited hours sat in the yard of the house and consumed drink brought to them they were not liable. In order to carry out what was clearly the intention of the Legislature, another Act has to be resorted to.—Birmingham Daily Post.

APPOINTMENTS.

* * We are requested to state that the lady married by Mr. Stansfeld, M.P., the new Financial Secretary of the Treasury, is the sister, and not, as stated by us (ante, p. 15), the daughter of Mr. William Henry Ashurst, the solicitor to the Post-office. We were betrayed into this error by the fact that the father of Mrs. Stansfeld bore the same Christian names as her brother. Mr. W. H. Ashurst, sen., was never solicitor to the Post-office; but his name is associated with the Post-office and Post-office reform from his having taken an active part in urging forward Sir Rowland Hill's Penny Postage scheme.

Mr. DAVID HENRY OWEN, of the Principal Registry London, has been appointed District Registrar of the Court of Probate at Norwich, which office was rendered vacant by the death of Mr. John Kitson.

Mr. ROBERT YEOMAN GREEN, solicitor, has been appointed Under-sheriff of Newcastle-upon-Tyne for the ensuing year. Mr. Green was certificated as a solicitor in Hilary Term, 1847.

Mr. FREDERICK THOMAS KEITH, solicitor, has been re-appointed Under-sheriff for the city of Norwich for the ensuing year. Mr. Keith belongs to the Norwich firm of Keith, Blake, Keith, & Blake.

Mr. GEORGE BROWN, solicitor (firm Newton, Robinson, & Brown); has been appointed Under-sheriff of the city of York for the ensuing year.

Mr. THOMAS EDMUND PAGET, solicitor (firm Lowndes & Co.), of Liverpool, has been appointed by Lord Dufferin, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to be District Prothonotary at Liverpool under the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster.

Mr. ARTHUR WILSON, solicitor, of Banbury, has been appointed Clerk to the Magistrates of the Banbury District, in the room of the late Mr. Thomas Gulliver Judge, deceased. Mr. Wilson was enrolled as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1857, and was in partnership with the late Mr. Judge whom he has now succeeded as Clerk to the Banbury Magistrates.

Messrs. CHARLES HARPER and FREDERICK L. S. SAFFORD, solicitors, of Hadleigh, Suffolk, have been appointed Joint Clerks to the Local Board of Hadleigh. Mr. Harper is a member of the legal firm of Newman & Harper, and was certificated in Trinity Term, 1850; and Mr. Safford, who took out his certificate in Hilary Term, 1855, belongs to the firm of Robinson, Safford, & Grimwade.

Mr. JOSEPH HARKER, solicitor, has been appointed Clerk to the Burial Board of Poole, Dorsetshire, in the room of Mr. Henry Mooring Aldridge, solicitor, resigned. Mr. Harker was a partner with Mr. Aldridge, his predecessor in office.

Mr. JOHN HENRY BELFRAGE, of Bedford-row, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Middlesex, the city of London, and the city and liberties of Westminster.

Mr. SAMUEL HALL, of the firm of Wright & Hall, solicitors, of Haslingden, Lancashire, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking the affidavits of married women in and for the city of Lancaster.

Mr. EDMUND STAMP, solicitor, has been elected Mayor of Honiton, Devonshire, for the ensuing year. He is also clerk to the justices of the Honiton division, registrar of the county court of that district, and clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes for the division of Colyton, co. Devon.

Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD BURRIDGE, solicitor, has been elected Mayor of Shaftesbury for the ensuing year.

Mr. CHARLES RICHARD NORTON, solicitor, of New-street, Salisbury, has been elected Mayor of that city for the ensuing year.

Mr. ALFRED JOHN KEARY, solicitor, of Chippenham, Wilts (firm Keary, Stokes, & Goldney), has been elected Mayor of Chippenham for the ensuing year.

Mr. THOMAS WASHBOURNE GIBBS, solicitor, has been elected Mayor of Bath for the ensuing year.

Mr. ROGER THERRY, formerly, for many years, a judge of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, has received the honour of knighthood from the Queen. Sir Roger Therrey was called to the Bar at Gray's-inn in November, 1827.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

COVENANT TO SETTLE AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

Sir,—I feel, no doubt in common with many others, grateful for your papers on the covenant frequently contained in marriage settlements for the settlement of the future property of a wife.

I always endeavour, if I can, to confine the operation of such covenants to property coming from some specified source—as for instance, from the estate of a father, mother, or near relative, dying either testate or intestate, or through any particular will or settlement already in operation.

I have also of late years so framed the clause as to exclude its operation as against the wife, in respect of property coming into actual possession after she has become a widow. It is hard, I think, that in such a case whatever might come to the widow should be put entirely out of her power, as she might thereby be deprived of the means of providing for a second family.

There is another point connected with this subject to which I beg to call your attention. It frequently happens that a testator wishes to give a legacy to a married woman, so that it shall not be liable to be brought into settlement under a covenant to settle future property.

To effect this, besides making the legacy payable to the legatee for her separate use, I have added words to the effect that it shall also be payable to her irrespective of any settlement made on or after her marriage. As property left for the separate use of a married woman would, under some of the forms, be included in the covenants, the question might arise whether, in such a case, the direction that the legatee should enjoy the legacy irrespective of the settlement, would be of any avail.

In discussing the subject with two experienced conveyancers they differed upon the point. One holding that in a case where property left for the separate use of a wife is not expressly excluded from the operation of the covenant, the words alluded to would not have the desired effect, and the other that they would.

As in most modern settlements, property left for the separate use of a wife is excepted, the question is not likely to arise; but it seems to me desirable to provide for it in case there should be no such exception, at the same time one would wish, if possible, to avoid introducing any expressions which might raise a doubt in legal minds, or become a trap to the unlearned.

Lincoln's-inn, Nov. 17, 1869.

THE LAW OF DISTRESS FOR RENT.

Sir,—Allow me to draw your attention to a case which shows that the law of landlord and tenant in England, as well as in Ireland, requires the early attention of the Legislature; the landlord's right to distrain for his rent is generally looked upon as an advantage to him, but occasionally cases happen which show that he is really worse off than he would be if left to the ordinary remedy of an action at law. A case is now in course of being fought out in the parish of Newington, Surrey, the facts of which will furnish the best commentary on the present state of the law. It appears that about twenty years ago a gentleman purchased several houses in the parish. He collected his rents in peace and security until about two years ago, when to his surprise he found a distress for rent had been put into two of his houses. He replevied in the county court of the district, and the goods were consequently returned to the tenants. The proceedings in the matter of the replevin warrant bound the tenants, or rather the landlord in their names, to bring an action against the distrainer to ascertain whether he had any claim on the property or not. When the case came on for hearing, the distrainer, as defendant, did not appear, and the Court awarded damages amounting to the costs incurred in the replevin proceedings. The damages were not paid, and the defendant was brought before the Court on an application for a committal to prison. The defendant turned out to be a helpless old woman of between eighty and ninety years of age, dependant entirely on charity for her support. She was assisted into court, and in the box declared that she was so nearly blind as to be able to see nothing of the judge, but what she thought must be his spectacles. The plaintiff stated that this poor creature had recently been an inmate of Lambeth Workhouse, and had signed the warrants of distress on his tenants. She gave not the slightest reason for her proceedings except asserting that the property was hers. The judge, after a careful inquiry, declined to send such a person to prison, notwithstanding the offer of the plaintiff not to enforce the order of committal if the defendant abstained from further annoyance. During the examination the old woman frequently reiterated her statement that the property belonged to her. Last week she again asserted her right by sending a couple of bailiffs to one of the houses with a claim for £10, as rent due to her. The men immediately removed a quantity of goods, the police declining, on the application of the tenant, to interfere, seeing that the men were armed with what had the appearance of a legal warrant of distress. The landlord is therefore left to his previous barren remedy of another replevin warrant and another action in the county court, with probably the same result. That the old woman is an instrument in the hands of an unseen mover in the matter seems tolerably clear; but the case shows how far irresponsible persons may make the present law of distraint a serious annoyance. The landlord has been almost ruined, as his tenants have either left or are about to leave from a dread of these proceedings being repeated.

The moral of the story is suggestive of the abolition of the landlord's exceptional power over his tenant's goods. Such cases as this could not happen if all warrants of distress were issued by a competent authority—say, a police court, and only in favour of the landlord actually in possession of the property. This would compel a claimant to prosecute his claim in a court of law instead of, as at present, leaving any man of straw at liberty to set up a claim for the mere sake of being bought off. It is really wonderful that in the existing state of the law we do not more frequently hear of such cases as the foregoing. There seems to be nothing to prevent a gang of thieves from going in broad daylight, under cover of a fictitious warrant of distress, and seizing any goods they may happen to fancy, and the police will look on, confessing themselves powerless. Of course, the thieves would be punishable severely for such an act, but they could get safe off with their booty long before the law could reach them. They would, in fact, run less risk than in committing a burglary.

H. R.

SOLICITORS' BOOK-KEEPING.

Sir,—Messrs. Kain, Sparrow, Witt, and Co., in your impression of the 6th inst., allude to the case of the solicitor at Braintree, as illustrating the danger of a solicitor mixing his client's money with his own, and they take the opportunity of telling the profession that the system of book-keeping advocated by them will prevent solicitors (who are not feloniously disposed) from falling into this danger through any defect in their book-keeping, inasmuch as "Kain's system" shows them "at any moment" the amount of money in their hands belonging to clients as distinct from their own. Now Kain's system really does not show the solicitor at a glance or "at any moment" how much money he holds belonging to clients as distinguished from that which belongs to himself. In point of fact an additional column on each side of the "cash journal" will be necessary for that purpose. By the process of balancing, this desirable object can be obtained, but this is simply the old method. Such a result is, however, accomplished in many large offices by additional columns being made in the cash journal, but it is an improvement to which the author of Kain's system has no claim. That Kain's system is simple and easily to be comprehended, is a statement that can only be accepted by an accountant who comes to the task of studying it with a mind previously imbued with the principles of double entry, and who can dispense with the nightly application of the "wet blanket" and the "cold tea" which is said to be necessary for the successful accomplishment of the task by every articulated pupil who enters the author's office. The study of bookkeeping I have heard it reported, results in one of three things, it either kills, drives mad, or makes the student an accomplished accountant, and it is best known to Mr. Kain as a professor of statistics how many of the adopters of his system belong to either of these classes. Most people "have a method in their madness," and I have known solicitors who have exhibited insanity enough by consigning Kain's system to the waste paper basket "boldly," having certain misgivings that they might go mad or die under the operation of studying it. It is to be regretted that so intelligent a body of men as solicitors are "bad accountants," which, I presume, means they are not accountants at all, and it is very essential that there should exist really practical law accountants and costs settlers, to afford them the best possible assistance at a fair rate of remuneration.

A LAW ACCOUNTANT AND COSTS
DRAFTSMAN.

OBITUARY.

MR. W. M. BEST.

It is with much regret that we record the death of Mr. William Mawdesley Best, well known to the profession as one of the editors of Best and Smith's Reports, and the author of a work on "Evidence: a Treatise on Presumptions of Law and Fact; Right to Begin and Right to Reply." Mr. Best was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and was called to the English bar in 1834, at Gray's-inn (then the favourite resort of Irish students), of which society he was elected a bencher some few years ago. He died somewhat suddenly on the 17th ult. Mr. Best was a lawyer of the highest type. He had a complete and accurate knowledge, coupled with a strength of grasp and breadth of view seldom met with. Of his work on Evidence, which was published in 1849, the late Baron Alderson once said that it showed more real brains than any law book published during his lifetime. On the morning succeeding the day of Mr. Best's death, the Lord Chief Justice gave expression to the general feeling in the following terms:—"It will not be out of place to take notice of the communication which has just been made to us of the death of one of the reporters of this court—Mr. Best—and to express our great regret at the loss which the profession has sustained, as well as our sense of the fidelity, accuracy, and ability with which he discharged his duty as authorised reporter of this court, in conjunction with his colleague, who, I am glad to say, still remains among us. The manner in which the duty has been discharged has given us the greatest satisfaction."

In spite of Mr. Best's great powers and attainments, he had not a large practice.

MR. J. H. HULME.

We have to record the death of Mr. James Hilton Hulme, solicitor, of Manchester, who expired at Cliff House, his seat at Baslow, in Derbyshire, on the 5th November, at the age of seventy-one years. The late Mr. Hulme, who was certificated as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1825, was the senior partner in the Manchester firm of Hulme, Foyster, & Foyster, and was for many years Clerk to the Salford Bench of Magistrates, and Deputy Steward of the Hundred of Salford Court of Record.

DR. COMBE.

The death of Matthew Combe, Esq., LL.D., barrister-at-law, took place at Nelson, New Zealand, on the 2nd September, in the forty-sixth year of his age. The deceased gentleman was the son of Boyce Combe, Esq., and was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. Dr. Combe was called to the Bar at Gray's Inn in June, 1847, and was for some years a member of the Home Circuit.

MR. W. H. ROUGH.

The death of Mr. William Henry Rough, barrister-at-law, took place on the 5th November, at Motecombe House, East Moulsey, Surrey. The deceased gentleman was the only son of the late Sir William Rough, some time Chief Justice of Ceylon, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1832. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1842, and has chiefly practised as a conveyancer at the Equity Bar.

MR. JOHN SHOARD.

Mr. John Shoard, a London solicitor, died at St. Thomas's Hospital on the 31st October, at the age of thirty-two years. Mr. Shoard received his early education at the Bristol Grammar School; he afterwards pursued his studies at King's College, London, and matriculated with honours in classics at the London University in 1856. In 1859 he graduated as LL.B. at the same institution, taking honours in law, and in 1861 he received the degree of LL.D. He took out his certificate as a solicitor in Hilary Term, 1860, and had offices in Chancery-lane some years ago, but latterly did not practise.

MR. F. TIBBITS.

Mr. Francis Tibbits, solicitor, of Warwick, committed suicide on the 13th November, by shooting himself through the head with a revolver, in his office, Church-street, Warwick. Mr. Tibbits, who was forty-four years of age, had been in practice as a solicitor since Easter Term, 1851, and for many years filled the offices of Clerk to the Warwick Bench of County Magistrates, and Registrar of the Warwick County Court.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

THE ASSOCIATED CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

BIRMINGHAM, November 17.

The representatives of the various chambers resumed their sittings this day, when the following legal topics received discussion:—

BANKRUPTCY REFORM.

In connection with the new Bankruptcy Act, the Birmingham Chamber had had under their consideration the rules and orders, and had agreed upon certain proposed amendments and alterations. The following suggestions were brought forward by Mr. G. J. Johnson and adopted:—

Rule 86-1, that "no part of the expense of any competition for the office of trustee shall be paid out of the estate, but all such expense shall be paid by the unsuccessful party to the successful party." Omit all words after "estate."

Rule 159 provided that if a debtor called his creditors together he should do it with the same publicity as if he were a bankrupt. But the rule also directed that every creditor must have notice by registered letter. Substitute "each creditor of £10 and upwards."

The next matter brought forward was not on the rules. By the Act the debtor was required to produce at the first meeting a statement of his affairs. The second meeting was to be held at the interval of a week, and the resolution of that meeting was to be binding on all the creditors. It was, therefore, proposed that a copy of the debtor's statement should be sent to every creditor not present at the first meeting. After some discussion, the words "not present at the first meeting" were disapproved, and in that form the suggestion was adopted; that is to say, the decision was in favour of every creditor receiving a copy of the bankrupt's statement of his affairs.

Rule 167.—The Act said that no creditor should be entitled to vote at all till he had proved the debt by statutory declaration. The 167th rule said a creditor should prove in the manner prescribed by the rules, and that was, to send a statement of account to the trustee. Suggestion: that, as the rules and the Act conflicted, it was desirable the chairman of the meeting should be authorised to take statutory declarations for the proof of debts. This was adopted by the meeting, and it was resolved that the suggestion should be forwarded by the Secretary to the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. HIRST (Leeds) proposed the following resolution:—"That the attention of the Law Officers of the Crown be called to the unsatisfactory provisions in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, in respect to deeds of composition and arrangement, which allow creditors holding the security of third parties to join in such deeds, and that they be requested to introduce a bill in the coming session of Parliament, providing that creditors holding such securities shall not be entitled to join in any deed of composition or arrangement binding on dissentients, which release a debtor on payment of any sum less than twenty shillings in the pound." He condemned the principle of composition deeds, but especially contended that the secured creditor had no right to forgive a debtor his debts, thus, in fact, making him a present of other people's money. He also complained that if a man bought goods and paid for them with a hundred sovereigns, the person of whom he bought them was not a creditor; but if, instead of doing this, he paid his money to the bank, and got a twenty-one days' bill, and endorsed that over to the creditor, as long as that bill was unpaid the owner of it was considered a creditor, and could unite in the statutory majority for releasing the debtor from his debts. A London lawyer had told him that in many instances of failure for more than £100,000, the debtor had been released under a composition deed on the payment of a small dividend, and that not one man who signed the release lost a single farthing by the debtor. He proposed that creditors holding security should give up their security, or not vote on a composition deed.

Mr. JOHNSON said he sympathised with Mr. Hirst in principle, but he was afraid that any proposal to remedy the mischief complained of would, if not very carefully considered, land them in a greater difficulty. The new Act viewed nothing as a security that was not a security on the bankrupt's property, and in the sense in which the law used the word "secured," a secured creditor could only vote for the balance. If they laid down Mr. Hirst's principle, they discredited every bill that came into the market, for a great inducement to discount a bill was that the discounteer knew that if all the three parties to the bill became bankrupt, he had three rights of proof on three estates. The effect of the resolution would be to shut him up to one right of proof only. Then, again, if almost all the creditors held bills, how were they to get a majority? They could not value their securities till they became due. If the Leeds resolution were consistent, it must go on to say that secured creditors, in that sense, should not be able to discharge a debtor when he was bankrupt, under section 48.

After some discussion, in which Mr. MILLS (Huddersfield) suggested that the resolution should be altered by being read as follows:—"That a sub-committee be formed to consider the unsatisfactory provisions," &c., Mr. HIRST replied. He said he was particularly anxious on this matter, because the blot to which he had called attention was imputed to the action taken by Chambers of Commerce. He would go the length of stopping composition deeds altogether sooner than allow the evil to continue. He believed it was at the root of a great many of the commercial scandals of the last ten years. He, however, accepted Mr. Mill's suggestion.

The resolution, which Mr. PRICE, M.P., seconded, was then carried in the amended form, and the committee appointed consisted of Mr. Godwin, Mr. Mills, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Hirst.

THE LONG VACATION.

It was unanimously resolved, "That a memorial be presented to the Judicature Commission, calling attention to the great inconvenience caused by the suspension of legal proceedings during the long vacation, and praying them to provide a remedy."—This was seconded by Mr. RIDLEY (Bristol), and carried unanimously.

BANKRUPTCY LAW IN IRELAND.

The PRESIDENT said that, in the absence of representatives of the Belfast Chamber, he had been requested to move, "That it is expedient that the law in Ireland should be uniform with the code in force in England, especially in matters relating to trade and commerce; and resolved, therefore, that her Majesty's Government be requested to introduce into Parliament a Bankruptcy Bill for Ireland similar to that which passed for England last session." He remarked that the proposition opened a very wide question. The laws of the two countries differed very considerably; and, possibly the Irish might in some instances prefer their own.

The last clause of the resolution was then passed.

COUNTY COURTS JURISDICTION IN BANKRUPTCY

Mr. PRICE, M.P. (Gloucester) remarked that under the new Bankruptcy Act every county court judge was a bankruptcy judge, and every county court was a bankruptcy court. This might work very well in some districts, but it would be extremely inconvenient in some of the agricultural counties. A judge might have twenty different courts in his circuit, and in some a bankruptcy case might not arise more than once in five or six years. The consequence would be that there would not be in such places professional men conversant with bankruptcy proceedings. To meet this difficulty, the Lord Chancellor should select such county courts as it might be convenient to make bankruptcy courts. Unless immediate action were taken, personal interests would grow up. The Lord Chancellor had the power, but he might not exercise it unless asked to do so.

Mr. G. J. JOHNSON said it would be well to ask the Lord Chancellor at the same time to continue the present bankruptcy courts for some twelve months, to dispose of the business now pending.

After discussion, it was resolved, "That the attention of the several Chambers be called to section 79 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and opinions be invited as to the desirability of memorialising the Lord Chancellor to exercise the power conferred upon him in that section, to limit the county courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy to such number as the public convenience and the amount of bankruptcy business may require, preference being given to places the most convenient of access (especially in agricultural districts), and at which adequate professional assistance may be obtained; and also to continue the existing bankruptcy courts for a limited time, to wind up the pending business, in order to prevent the inconvenience of transferring such business to the county courts."

THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Mr. BEHRENS (Bradford) gave notice that the subject of the expediency of repealing the Statute of Frauds, would be brought forward at the February meeting. He said the Statute of Frauds was not a statute for preventing frauds, but for encouraging them. The clause to which he objected was: "No contract for the sale of any goods for £10 and upwards shall be good unless the bargain be made and signed by the persons, except when there has been acceptance of any part of the goods, payment of part of the price, or something given by way of earnest to bind the bargain."

Mr. HIRST said that the representatives of all the Chambers, except those of the textile districts, would be against Mr. Behrens on this subject.

Mr. BEHRENS hoped to be able to convince them all that they ought not to be against him.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the Society, held on Tuesday the 16th inst., Mr. Austin in the chair, the following question was discussed:—"If goods are bought and sold by sample, and accord with the sample, is there an implied warranty that they are merchantable as to such matters as could not be judged of by the sample (Mody v. Gregson, 17 W. R. 176)?" The debate was opened by Mr. Woolf in the affirmative, and after a discussion, in which thirteen members took part, the question was decided by the chairman's casting vote in the affirmative, the number of votes on either side being equal. Two gentlemen were elected members of the society, and six new members were proposed. The number of members attending the debate was thirty-eight.

CHAIR OF HINDU, MAHOMMEDAN AND INDIAN LAW.

Mr. Standish Grove Grady, the Reader in Hindu, Mahomedan, and Indian laws to the Inns of Court, delivered his inaugural lecture in the Middle Temple Hall, on Saturday, the 13th inst.

Mr. Grady said the importance of the subjects involved in these lectures was apparent when it was recollected that the superficial extent of India was estimated at 1,287,483 square miles, and the population at 140,000,000, by some supposed to be 170,000,000, amongst whom we had to administer various and conflicting laws. He pointed out the difficulties which students encountered in studying the law, from the want of elementary works, and alluded to the pernicious practice of sending officers to India to fulfil judicial functions in entire ignorance of the laws they had to administer. He then traced the sources of primitive law and the alterations it underwent from time to time until it eventuated in the establishment of the five schools of law. He contrasted the revolution by which this was effected with the causes which produced the great French Revolution, and showed that in England we escaped from such disasters by the flexibility of the common law; while decisions have been treated as authoritative, they have not been inexorable. Precedents are held good media, and proofs of illustration or confirmation where they are held to agree with acknowledged principles of the common law; but where there is a complex state of facts, our common law judges fall back upon what they apprehend to be the spirit of the common law, and are guided thereby in their decisions. This flexibility has kept the common law pari passu with the development of society and its actual wants. But in the progress of law and its adaptation to natural wants, what has been disparagingly called "judge-made law" has often secured this country from that kind of conflict which is so marked and so unfortunate a feature of French and Hindu history. The lecturer showed that the laws of Menu were not to be compared with the Institutes of Republican Rome, or to those of the Empire, being a compilation and not a pure and original system of jurisprudence, like the Institutes of Menu. He then pointed out the sources of the law and the works that were of authority in each of the schools; the close resemblance between the Hindu system and those of the Western world, particularly with regard to the law of adoption and the law of caste. He showed that the Hindus, as far back as the twelfth century before Christ, were by Menu divided into four classes. The ancient inhabitants of Egypt were so divided; and the people of Crete were so divided by the laws of Minos. In Attica the people were divided into four classes by Cecrops, and afterwards by Theseus into three, by uniting the sacerdotal and noble.

Mr. Grady treated the subject of Mahomedan law in the same systematic manner, tracing the sources of the law to its fountain, giving a short account of Mahomet, showing the cause of the schism which led to division of the two sects, the Sunnahs, and the Shiites, and the points wherein they differed on questions of legal doctrine, and referring to the works that are considered by each sect as authoritative. The lecturer then entered into a discussion of the modifications introduced into the native systems of laws, and the mode of their administration, by English positive enactments, and gave a complete and comprehensive narrative of British legislation, as applied to the different Presidencies at different times, from the earliest charter of the first James to the most recent statutes of the present reign.

The introductory address was listened to with marked attention by a numerous assemblage of students, including many natives of India and pupils from the colonies. Several leading members of the bar and representatives of the benchers were also present.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds have exhibited a marked improvement this week. At its commencement a belief in improved trade prospects imparted strength to Consols, and with the exception of a relapse on Wednesday the improved tone has been fully maintained, the slight advance in price being aided by a scarcity of the stocks in the market. The share and foreign markets commenced briskly, but did not maintain the same tone. About the middle of the week railways experienced much fluctuation, and foreign securities became dull. To-day, however, shows a firm tone in all. Great Westerns have this week receded a little from the improved price at which they were recently quoted.

The Council of Legal Education have awarded to George Lewis, Esq., student of the Middle Temple, the Studentship of the Four Inns of Court. This is the highest distinction a student from the Bar can attain. Mr. Lewis is the son of the Rev. G. T. Lewis, of Exminster, and a former pupil of Messrs. Daw & Son, solicitors, Exeter. At the examination for solicitors he obtained the prize of the Incorporated Law Society; having previously gained the "Davis" prize for 1867. On his passing the examination to qualify for the Bar, in May last, a certificate of honour of the first class was conferred upon him by the Council of Legal Education.

The late Viscount Canterbury, who died on the 13th November, had been nominated by his grandfather, who was Archbishop of Canterbury, to the reversion of the office of registrar of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and since the abolition of that office has been in receipt of a handsome pension up to the date of his death. His successor in the title, the Hon. Sir J. H. T. Manners-Sutton, K.C.B., Governor of Victoria, has for many years held the office of registrar of the Faculty Court, the duties of which are performed by his deputies, while he has been serving her Majesty at the Antipodes, and receiving emoluments at the rate of £10,000 per annum.

Mr. Acton Smee Ayrton, M.P., barrister-at-law, has been sworn in as a member of the Privy Council, on accepting the office of Chief Commissioner of Works and Public Buildings. The right hon. gentleman has also been re-elected, without opposition, M.P. for the Tower Hamlets.

From a Treasury Return published this week it appears that from March 1 to September 30 there was paid to election judges for expenses £1,502, nearly £6,000 was paid to marshals, registrars, mayors, and town clerks, besides £5,000 for short-hand writing.

The office of Crown Solicitor to the Government of Jamaica has become vacant by the death of Mr. A. W. Aikman, who succumbed under the effects of injuries received in a railway accident.

GRESHAM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY,
37, OLD JEWRY, LONDON, E.C.

SOLICITORS are invited to introduce, on behalf of their clients, Proposals for Loans on Freehold or Leasehold Property, Reversions, Life Interests, or other adequate securities.

Proposals may be made in the first instance according to the following form:—

PROPOSAL FOR LOAN ON MORTGAGES.

Date.....
 Introduced by (state name and address of solicitor)
 Amount required £
 Time and mode of repayment (i.e., whether for a term certain, or by annual or other payments)
 Security (state shortly the particulars of security, and, if land or buildings, state the net annual income).
 State what Life Policy (if any) is proposed to be effected with the Gresham Office in connection with the security.

By order of the Board,

F. ALLAN CURTIS, Actuary and Secretary.

Newington-butts, near the Elephant and Castle.—Important Freehold Properties, comprising a commanding corner public-house, six capital shops, and spacious premises, with stabling, yards, &c.; let at low rents, with valuable early reversions, presenting investments of the soundest character; also 22 substantial Dwelling-houses, in the occupation of respectable tenants; the whole of the estimated value of £1,150 per annum.

MESSRS. GADSDEN, ELLIS, & SCORER have received instructions to SELL by AUCTION, at the MART, on TUESDAY, DECEMBER 7th, 1869, at TWO o'clock precisely, by order of the Trustees, in numerous lots, an important FREEHOLD ESTATE, being Nos. 141, 143, 145, 147, 149, 151, and 153, Newington-butts, with extensive buildings, yards, and stabling in the rear; also, including the newly-built tavern, known as The Ship; chiefly let on old leases to responsible tenants at rents amounting to £400 per annum, but moderately estimated to be worth at least £300 per annum, affording undeniable freehold investments, with reversions in from nine to 19 years to double the present rents. Also 22 Dwelling-houses, at the rear of the preceding property, forming a large proportion of Frederick-place, partly let on lease, the remainder in the occupation of a very respectable class of tenants, at weekly, monthly, and quarterly rents, and producing about £350 per annum. The property is freehold, and from its central position always commands a respectable and responsible tenantry, and presents a very favourable opportunity for investments of the most advantageous description. The greater part of the purchase-moneys may remain on mortgage.

Particulars, with plans, may be obtained of Messrs. MARSON, DADLEY, & CHAMBERS, Solicitors, 1, Southwark-bridge-road; at the Mart; at the Ship Tavern, on the property; at the Elephant and Castle; at the Horns, Kennington; and of Messrs. GADSDEN, ELLIS, & SCORER, 18, Old Broad-street, City.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 27, 1869.

IT IS PUBLICLY ANNOUNCED that Bishop Trower and some other clergy of the diocese of Exeter mean to appear at Bow Church to oppose the confirmation of the election of Dr. Temple to the see of Exeter. If the intention of the opposers is carried out, we may expect a renewal, in the Court of Queen's Bench, of the interesting discussion which occurred on the appointment of the late Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford. On that occasion the confirmation of the Bishop's election was opposed by three clergymen, two of whom were beneficed in the diocese of Hereford, on the ground that the bishop elect had published works repugnant to the doctrine of the Established Church, and that he, therefore, had been censured by the University of Oxford. The Commissioners appointed by the metropolitan to confirm the election of Dr. Hampden declined to listen to the objections urged against the confirmation, and proceeded in the form usual where no opposition is made. Thereupon a rule was obtained from the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus to the archbishop or his vicar-general to hear the objections, which was afterwards most elaborately argued by the Attorney-General (Sir John Jervis), the Solicitor-General (Sir D. Dundas), Mr. M. D. Hill, Dr. Bayford and Mr. Waddington on behalf of the archbishop, and by Sir Fitzroy Kelly (the present Lord Chief Baron), Dr. Addams, Mr. Stephens, Mr. Peacock (the present Chief Justice of India), and Mr. Badeley for the opposers. (See 3 Queen's Bench Reports, p. 483.) On the one side it was said that the archbishop's duty in confirming the election of the nominee of the Crown was, under the 25 Hen. 8, c. 20, s. 7, merely ministerial. On the other, that according to the ancient canon law "confirmation" was a technical word, and that the statute did no more than compel the archbishop to confirm the election of the bishop elect according to the law of the Church—that is to say, after a judicial inquiry into the grounds of any opposition which might be openly made to his appointment. In short, one party contended that the metropolitan's office was not judicial but ministerial, and that the venerable formality of citing opposers to appear on pain of contumacy was a formality and nothing more; the other party contended with an extraordinary display of learning and research, that the archbishop's function was judicial as well as ministerial, and that although the Crown had an absolute power of placing a bishop it had not an absolute power of making one, if good cause to the contrary were shown. The argument, which occupies no less than sixty-five pages in the Queen's Bench Reports (pp. 498—563) was heard on January 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th, 1848, and on the 1st February following the judges delivered their opinions. Lord Denman (the Chief Justice) and Mr. Justice Erle held that the objections to confirmation could not be heard, the 25 Hen. 8, c. 20, making it imperative on the Metropolitan to consecrate. Mr. Justice Patteson and Mr. Justice Coleridge on the other hand held that the objections ought to have been heard, or that, at all events, the matter was so doubtful that there was good reason for requiring a return to a writ of mandamus. The Court being thus equally divided, no order for the issue of a writ was made.

The question, therefore, which Bishop Trower and his friends have determined to raise is not in any way concluded by authority. We presume, however, that the commissioners will in Dr. Temple's case, as in Dr. Hampden's, refuse to hear objections, leaving the opposers, as in the earlier case, to apply for a mandamus. On the fate of such an application we do not at present venture to hazard a prediction. But we are guilty of no want of respect to the Court of Queen's Bench as at present constituted, in saying that its members are still less likely than they were in 1848 to sanction any infringement on the absolute supremacy of the Crown in matters ecclesiastical.

But assuming that a mandamus is eventually granted, it by no means follows that Dr. Temple's election would be imperilled. The opposers would then have to set to work to prove him unfit for his office, on the ground, we presume, that he, like Dr. Hampden, "had published works which were repugnant to the doctrine of the Established Church," and which had been censured, not indeed by the University of Oxford, but by Convocation. It so happens that the latter ground of opposition could not be technically proved in point of fact, so that the opposers would have to establish a case of heresy afresh. It is not the function of this journal, we need scarcely observe, to give an opinion on the orthodoxy of Dr. Temple, but remembering the decisions of the Judicial Committee in the cases of the Rev. Dr. Williams and the Rev. H. B. Wilson, two of the co-essayists of Dr. Temple, we have no hesitation in asserting that in point of law no charge of heresy against him can be successfully established.

OUR REMARKS LAST WEEK upon the subject of the registration appeals, having been reprinted by the Times, Mr. Sidney Smith, of the City of London Liberal Registration Association, has made them a pretext for addressing a long letter to that newspaper on the subject. Mr. Sidney Smith, as an unsuccessful litigant, is of course privileged to complain of the decision given against him by the Court of Common Pleas, but he is not entitled to enlist us on his side in the matter, as he virtually does by styling our remarks, strictures upon the decision of the Common Pleas in Smith v. Lancaster. On the contrary we said that the decision which the revising barrister had pronounced in that case at the instance of Mr. Sidney Smith, had created considerable surprise in the profession, and its reversal by the Common Pleas, so far as we ventured to pass judgment upon it, met our entire approval. Mr. Smith, however, appears on the whole more aggrieved by the decision in Cuthbertson v. Butterworth, given against him last year, than by that in Smith v. Lancaster this year. He does not argue that Smith v. Lancaster is wrong, but only that it is wrong if the previous decision is right. If the case of Cuthbertson v. Butterworth is to be understood as going the length which Mr. Sidney Smith considers it does—that is, that whatever his claim may be, in no case can the under-tenant in the Temple be entitled, we think that he has some ground for dissatisfaction. It was evident, however, on the argument of Smith v. Lancaster, that whatever may be the ultimate decision of the Court upon this point, the judges mean to treat Cuthbertson v. Haines as a decision only to the point that the room occupied was not a house. The reports do not generally state how the third column of the register was filled up in Butterworth's case; we believe, however, that the qualification entered really was "chambers." It was not, however, put to the Court upon the argument, that there need not be structural severance in the case of a building other than a house. It is true it was contended that chambers were ejusdem generis with shop, warehouse, &c., but the effect of this as obviating the necessity of structural severance was not pointed out. On the contrary, the point insisted upon was that there was structural severance in that case. Thus, therefore, although if the qualification entered in the list really was chambers and not house, the decision of the Court really covered the point in question, yet they certainly did not consider it, and it is to be hoped that we are right in thinking it still open. Indeed, if it is not, it is difficult, as Mr. Sidney Smith says, to see how the merchants and others who have always voted for their counting-houses can retain their votes. This, however, will come before the Court in one of the remaining registration cases, Piercy v. Maclean, also from the City of London, and it is to be hoped that the Court will then decide that a counting-house need not be structurally severed from the rest of the building within which it is contained. We differ, however, from Mr. Sidney Smith when he accuses the judges of the Court of Common Pleas not only of bad law but of ignorance of philology and the English language, and supports that accusation by the assertion that the doctrine that a dwelling-house must be a whole house, any more than a mere house or a counting-house, has no foundation in law or in anything more than mere whim. Counting-house and shop, at all events, even if not warehouse, seem to us in their ordinary meaning to import a part of a larger building, while house in its ordinary meaning does not. But whatever view may be taken of Cuthbertson v. Butterworth, Mr. Smith's notion that that case and Smith v. Lancaster cannot stand together is founded on a fallacy. He considers that exclusive occupation by one person necessarily negatives constructive occupation by another. This shows that he does not understand what the Courts mean by constructive occupation. So far from the exclusiveness of the occupation of the one negating the constructive occupation of the other, it may assist in proving it. What is meant by constructive occupation in these cases is not a partial or joint occupation with another, but occupation in the person of another. It is that the master of a house occupies in certain cases by his under-tenants or lodgers, in the same way that a master may occupy in the person of his servants. The distinction, in fact, is not between exclusive occupation and constructive, but between constructive occupation and actual bodily occupation. If the occupation of the lodger is in law the occupation of the landlord, then the more exclusive it is the better does it establish that of the landlord.

There is one other point on which Mr. Sidney Smith's letter deserves notice. He quotes the cases of Toms v. Luckett (2 Lut. p. 19) and Scores v. Haggett (7 M. & G. 95), as if they were reliable authorities, whereas they were both elaborately reviewed in the judgment in Cook v. Humber, and an interpretation put upon them which much shakes their authority as originally reported. Taken together with the explanation so put upon them they are authorities, but without it none at all. It is not, of course, our business to defend the judges against the aspersions of Mr. Sidney Smith, but we must protest against his statement that what he calls the confusion worse confounded existing in the law of registration is due entirely to Westminster Hall. It is all very well to call for simplicity of legislation to relieve the nation from the ingenious perversity of the law; but it is only fair to say that the present state of the law is due in great measure to the fact that the legislation hitherto has been anything but simple. Was any definition of a house ever given by the Court of Common Pleas to be compared in ingenious perversity with the definition of a house in the Act of 1867?

SINCE OUR REMARKS LAST WEEK, the Court of Common Pleas have decided three registration appeals, all of which were cases rather of special than general interest, though all cases of importance. In the case of the Naval Knights of Windsor, the votes were disallowed; their fate therefore being the same as that of the military knights whose case was decided some years ago. The principal point in the case is, that the rule which has always been recognised with reference to members of corporations was put into definite shape; and it was laid down that when an individual member of a corporation aggregate occupies a part of the corporate property, in furtherance of the purpose for which the corporation was founded, the occupation shall be taken primâ facie to be the occupation of the corporation and not of the individual, and as such can confer no vote on the individual. In the next case, that of the Canons of Exeter, this rule was again exemplified. There the Canons were not only members of the corporation aggregate of the Dean and Chapter, but were also recognised by the law as corporations sole, and as such entitled to hold property to themselves and their successors. It was, therefore, held that the revising barrister was justified in coming to the conclusion that they occupied their residential houses in right of their canopies—that is, in an individual right and not in their character as members of the corporation aggregate. The vote was therefore upheld.

The only remaining case was that of the Middlesex incumbents. This case has excited some attention, but when the facts were known it proved a most simple one, and the decision of the revising barrister was, without hesitation, confirmed by the Court. It was, after a short discussion, clear that none of the sources of income of these incumbents of district churches could be considered as derived from land, except perhaps in the case of those who had an assignment of pew-rents. The revising barrister had, however, allowed the votes of these, and therefore this point did not arise upon the appeal. It would appear that the appellants who had had their votes disallowed desired to raise the broad question whether they could not have a vote without any income from land, which of course would have been contrary to all received notions upon the point. Sir John Karslake, who argued for the appellants, when asked by the Court whether he could possibly maintain this point, could do no more for his clients than quote a story of a Chancery barrister, who when told there was no ground for a particular appeal, said he thought so too, but the Lord Chancellor, being a much better lawyer than he was, might, perhaps, be able to find one.

THE BENCHERS OF THE MIDDLE TEMPLE have announced that after the first day of Hilary Term next all dinners are to be prepaid. Tickets are to be issued, resembling railway tickets in form, and like them classified into first, second, and third class (benchers, barristers, and students). These tickets will be given out by an official in the "screens" outside the hall, but it is not, we believe, intended to station him at a pigeon-hole, labelled "pay here." This innovation is owing, it is said, to the very alarming arrears into which some of the Middle Templars get. The new plan is rather undignified, and we can hardly imagine that it is necessary. Why not make a rule that no one shall dine in hall who has not paid all arrears, say up to the end of the preceding term, and "screen" all who fall two terms in arrear? Some one invented the supposition that the defaulters are so many and exalted that they must be screened in another sense—and that hence this new plan, somewhat letting off the past at the expense of the future. So far, however, as the Benchers are concerned, this notion has been expressly contradicted by a letter of the under-treasurer to a daily contemporary, in which he states that the Benchers never are in arrears, but if they were would be "screened" the same as anyone else. We do not imagine that many arrears were allowed in the old times when the Inns of Court really were a law university. In those times there were butteries in the Middle Temple, just as there now are in every Oxford and Cambridge college; there was dinner in hall all the year round (and not, as now, only in term time) only that in vacation term dinner was sometimes as early as 10 a.m. There were also various regulations as to the students' dress, and some almost identical with that old Oxford statute which forbids the "proud and ridiculous custom of walking abroad in boots." Among other things now lost sight of, the students claimed an immunity from arrest within the precincts of the Temple. The main difference, however, between the Temple of those days and the Temple of these, is that the Temple of those days really was a law university in which persons were appointed to teach, and the students were expected to learn, whilst now-a-days no one need learn anything whatever unless he chooses.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR has just issued an order allowing the county court offices to be closed on Monday, the 27th of December. The closing is made permissive, and not compulsory, doubtless with a view to the possibility of sittings of some of the courts having been fixed for that day. Closing will, however, be the rule in London, and the exceptions will be very rare everywhere.

ON WEDNESDAY LAST Vice-Chancellor James made an order for winding-up the Family Endowment Society, an insurance company which had been "amalgamated" some years back by the Albert. The petitioner was the holder of two annuities granted by the Family Endowment Society, and who, since the "amalgamation," had received payment of his annuities from the Albert. The question, of course, was whether this annuitant was right in claiming to be a creditor of the Family Endowment.

The Vice-Chancellor considered that there was no evidence of a "novation" of contract or an adoption by the annuitant of the Albert instead of the Family Endowment Society, and accordingly held him still a creditor of the former company. It appears, therefore, that Vice-Chancellor James, though, of course, regarding this question, as we have done, as a question on evidence of intention, by no means adopts our views as to what is such evidence. It is to be feared that in the case of companies which have long ceased business the searching out of contributories will be an expensive matter.

A FELON, being dead in law, is of course incapable of sitting and voting in the House of Commons (see Coke, 4th Institute, 47), and the election of the convict Rossa as member for Tipperary will therefore be presently declared void. But it is not, as has been supposed by some of the daily journals, absolutely void, any more than would be the election of any other person de facto ineligible for an ordinary reason; on account, for instance, of his being a clergyman or a Government contractor. The voters in Tipperary are entitled to nominate a felon, and to throw away their votes upon him if they please, and the sheriff, although he may be satisfied that the candidate and the felon are one and the same person, has no power to withdraw his name when it has been duly proposed and seconded.

Cases are not wanting in which members of Parliament, after their election, have been disqualified by their being found guilty of felony or treason. A notable example is that of Smith O'Brien, who was convicted of treason in 1848 whilst member for the county of Limerick. His seat thereby was ipso facto vacated and a new writ issued. But we believe that the present is the first case where a convict has been elected a member of the Legislature whilst he is actually undergoing his sentence. There can, however, be but little doubt as to the proper line of action to be pursued, assuming that the returning officer declines to take upon himself the risk of returning Mr. Heron at once. When Parliament meets that gentleman will in all probability claim the seat by petition, and his claim, as a matter of course, will be immediately allowed by the election judge. If he should not take this step the seat will be declared vacant and a new writ will be ordered to issue, or, if the state of the county render it necessary, the writ will be suspended as long as the House may think fit.

No doubt the shortest and best way to settle the difficulty would be for the returning officer himself to decide on the question of Rossa's ineligibility when the poll is declared. The risk of such a course would be great if there were any reasonable doubt that Rossa is in fact disqualified. A wrong decision would lay open the returning officer to an action for penalties. But as it is the only risk he would encounter would be of personal violence and, not of pecuniary loss. The contrary course might lay him open to an action on the part of Mr. Heron—which, however, the latter would not be very likely to bring.

THE PRESIDENT, Vice-President, and Council of the Incorporated Law Society entertained the Vice-Chancellor Sir William M. James, Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Commissioner Bacon, Sir Thomas Henry, Sir Benjamin Phillips, Mr. George Osborne Morgan, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Goldney, M.P., Mr. Alderman Stone, the Master Benett, and others at dinner, at the hall of the society on Wednesday last.

WE VENTURED AT THE TIME to express our strong dissent from the reasoning of Mr. Commissioner Winslow in setting aside the adjudication in bankruptcy which had been obtained against the Duke of Newcastle. That decision has since been reversed by Lord Justice Giffard, his Lordship thinking, as we did, that "the case, though perhaps of some importance, was sufficiently plain, and quite free from any real difficulty."

The argument in favour of supporting the Commissioner's decision was to the effect that proceedings in bankruptcy would conflict with the privileges of Parliament, and that no intention to interfere with those privileges in the case of privileged persons other than traders sufficiently appeared. In order to support this contention it is necessary to endeavour to do what the learned Commissioner had not done—namely, to show what privilege was infringed by bankruptcy. This was sought to be done, if we understand the argument aright, by showing that in early times, and at the date of the earliest Bankrupt Acts, the Houses of Parliament claimed for their members not only exception from arrest, but also immunity from process against their goods; and by contending that the whole series of Bankrupt Acts must be looked at together as a connected series; and the inference seems to be that for the purposes of bankruptcy the privileges of Parliament must be taken to be what they were before any Bankrupt Act was passed, except so far as the Bankrupt Acts themselves have controlled them. And then it was argued that the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 did not take away the supposed privilege of non-traders having privilege of Parliament.

The answer to this is two-fold. In the first place, at any period which it is at all important to consider for this purpose, the privilege of Parliament extended only to immunity from arrest. And this the Lord Justice seems to have considered the true view. And if so, there was no reason to doubt the correctness of Lord Hardwicke's dictum that a peer might be made a bankrupt, or of his statement that one had been so made, before any special provisions on the subject had been made by any statute.

But the most important answer to the whole argument is that the Acts of 1849 and 1861 have fully dealt with the matter. The Act of 1849 contained full and elaborate provisions as to the bankruptcy of privileged persons who were (what all bankrupts must then have been) traders. And the Act of 1861 put all debtors, whether trader or not, on the same footing. As the Lord Justice put it—"traders" includes privileged traders, and "all debtors" are substituted for 'such traders.'"

THE OPERATION OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1869, ON VOLUNTARY AND OTHER SETTLEMENTS.

NO. II.

The most convenient method for considering the scope of the 91st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, is to treat it as divided into two parts; the first relating to voluntary settlements, the second relating to ante-nuptial covenants or contracts to settle after-acquired property.

Before entering upon the consideration of the section, a couple of preliminary matters must be disposed of. It may be asked, in the first place, will the section apply to settlements dated before the 1st of January, 1870? To this an answer in the negative must be given. The section is clearly not retrospective in its operation. Again, it must not be lost sight of that "settlement" in the section means any disposition of property, it being expressly enacted that "settlement shall, for the purposes of this section, include any conveyance or transfer of property." Of course, the words will be understood as restricted to transfers in writing, and not as extended to gifts of money or chattels perfected by delivery.

It will be noticed that only those settlements which are voluntary fall within the scope of the first part of the section. The following three classes of settlements are expressly excluded from its operation:—(1) Settlements made before, and in consideration of, marriage; (2) settlements made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration; (3) post-nuptial settlements, made on or for the wife and children of the settlor, of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife. In the first of the three classes—settlements made before, and in consideration of, marriage—settlements made after marriage in pursuance of binding contracts entered into before marriage, are included; although, of course, the mere recital in a settlement made after marriage of ante-nuptial articles is not sufficient evidence of the existence of such articles against the creditors of the settlor (see Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst. 113). Upon the second class of settlements, those "made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer, in good faith and for valuable consideration," two questions arise. The first is—must a settlement to fall within this class be made upon the person from whom the consideration moves, or is it sufficient if it is made by his direction upon someone else? In Holmes v. Penney (5 W. R. 132, 3 K. & J. 90), a settlor, in consideration of his brother having paid some of his debts, by a deed to which his brother was a party, settled his life interest in a fund upon himself, his wife, and his children; and this was held not to be a voluntary settlement. So in Thompson v. Webster (4 De G. & J. 600) a man in embarrassed circumstances pursuant to an agreement with his mother, who lent him £190, gave her a mortgage upon an estate, and settled the equity of redemption upon his children. The settlement in this case was held not to be voluntary. Was the settlement in Holmes v. Penney one made "in favour of" the brother of the settlor, and was the settlement in Thompson v. Webster one made "in favour of" the mother of the settlor within the meaning of section 91? It would seem that it must be held that they were so made, for a settlement made pursuant to the direction of a person is as much "in favour" of such person as one made upon him or her. Of course the brother in the one case and the mother in the other must have acted "in good faith;" but the burden of proving that they did not so act would rest upon those who sought to upset the settlement. What construction—whether liberal or strict—will be placed by the courts upon the words "in good faith" it is impossible to predict. Probably, however, by analogy with Colombine v. Penhall (2 Sm. & G. 228), a settlement of this description will be held to be made in good faith, unless it is part of a scheme, to which the purchaser was privy, to defraud the creditors of the settlor under the guise of providing for the objects of the purchaser's bounty. The second question—the first having been answered as previously mentioned—is, supposing a settlement to be made on his wife by B. of property, part of which is contributed by himself, and part by A., in consideration of B.'s providing and settling such other part, is that a settlement made in A.'s favour of the whole fund, or only of the part provided by him? The answer to this question is fraught with more difficulty. Were the settlement on all fours with that in Hammonds v. Barrett (17 W. R. 1078), where the settlor only provided £920, and the other party £4,000, there can be little doubt but that it would be held to be made in favour of a purchaser in good faith and for valuable consideration, but were the conditions reversed it might very well be held that there was an absence of that "good faith" in the purchaser which is a necessary ingredient to support a settlement.

The third class of settlements expressly exempted are those made for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife. Here again a difficulty presents itself as to the construction to be placed upon the word "accrued." There can be no doubt that if the father of A.'s wife dies leaving her a legacy of £1,000 by his will, but not for her separate use, and no settlement was executed upon the marriage of A. and his wife, containing a covenant to settle after-acquired property, that £1,000 accrues to A. after marriage in right of his wife, but if B. being entitled to a vested reversionary interest under her father's will, or £1,000 expectant on the death of her mother, marries A. without a settlement, and the mother dying A. reduces the £1,000 into possession, would that £1,000 be held to have accrued to A. after marriage in right of his wife? It would seem that it would, for A. by the marriage did not acquire a vested, but only a contingent, interest in the £1,000.

With these exceptions every settlement made by a trader will, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee of the bankruptcy; and, further, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years of the date of the settlement, the settlement is void against the trustee, unless those claiming under it can prove "that the settlor was at the time of the making of the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in such settlement." In the first case the settlement is void in toto; in the second it is void unless those who claim under it can prove the solvency of the settlor at the date of the settlement, and this will, at the expiration of several years, be no easy matter. A recital in the settlement of the state of the testator's assets and liabilities will not be evidence of his solvency against the trustee. In fact an account taken will be the only satisfactory evidence. On account of this difficulty it will be impossible to make out a good or even a marketable title to real property comprised in a voluntary settlement made by a trader until ten years have elapsed from the date of settlement. But assuming that those who claim under the settlement can prove the solvency of the settlor, that fact does not render it indefeasible. It may still be impeached by the creditor under the 13 Eliz. c. 5, and then the onus lies upon the creditors of proving that the settlement was contrived to "delay, hinder, or defraud" them. Herein lies a grave objection to the section, that settlements which fall within its scope fall also under the operation of the statute of Elizabeth. Had the framers of the section followed the wording of the law laid down in the statute of Elizabeth and its interpretation in the decided cases, and required those claiming under a settlement to prove that it was not intended to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, they would have obviated this objection and also the still more serious one that the section as it stands does not touch the most common form of fraudulent voluntary settlements. Even under the existing law a man seldom executes a voluntary settlement when actually insolvent, and more seldom when he renders himself insolvent thereby. The most common form of fraudulent voluntary settlement is that whereby A., having £10,000 capital, and owing £4,000 in debts, settles £5,000 upon his family previous to engaging in some speculative business. If he becomes bankrupt within two years from the date of the settlement it would be void against his trustee under section 91; but suppose the smash does not come for three years, then the settlement is good under the section, those claiming under it being able to prove that the settlor was at the time of making of the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in such settlement, although of course it is open to the trustee to take proceedings to upset the settlement under the statute of Elizabeth.

The second portion of the section deals with covenants or contracts made by a trader in consideration of marriage for the future settlement upon or for his wife or children of any money or property wherein he had not at the date of his marriage any estate or interest whether vested or contingent, in possession or remainder, and not being money or property of or in right of his wife. These covenants or contracts are, in the event of the maker becoming bankrupt before the property or money has been actually paid or transferred pursuant thereto, to be void against the trustee in bankruptcy. But covenants by a husband to settle the after-acquired property of his wife, and covenants to settle property which vests in the husband by virtue of the marriage or belongs to him at the time of the marriage are not within the scope of the section. Nor must it be lost sight of that the section does not apply to the common case of a covenant or contract in an ante-nuptial settlement by the father or mother of the intended wife or husband to pay a sum of money or transfer property to the trustees of the settlement, to be held by them upon the trusts thereof. A trader may, therefore, on the marriage of his daughter, covenant in her ante-nuptial settlement to pay a sum of money to the trustees, and in the event of his bankruptcy before payment, the covenant will not be void, and the trustees will be entitled to come in and prove as creditors under the bankruptcy. In fact the only covenants or contracts to which the section applies are those for a future settlement upon the wife or children of the settlor of property which does not belong to him at the time of his marriage, and comes to him afterwards, but not in his marital right.

EQUITY.

PRACTICE—REVIVOR AGAINST INFANTS COMING INTO ESSE DURING PROGRESS OF SUIT.

Auster v. Haines, L.C., 17 W. R. 900; Countess of Egremont v. Thompson, L.C., ib.

The 52nd section of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, was intended to render unnecessary the expense of a bill of revivor or supplemental bill in case of a suit "becoming abated by death, marriage, or otherwise, or defective by reason of some change or transmission of liability." The process substituted is an order of course to revive, after which all parties who would otherwise have become parties to a bill of revivor or supplemental bill, become parties to the original suit, and are bound by the proceedings therein, provided that such persons may object within twelve days of service on them of the order, and that where such persons are under disability the order is to be of no effect until a guardian ad litem has been appointed. The cases of Pickford v. Brown (1 K. & J. 643), Fullerton v. Martin (1 Dr. 238), Jebb v. Tugwell (20 Beav. 461), Cresswell v. Bateman (6 W. R. 220), and several others (See Morgan, Ch. Acts and Orders, 4th ed. 213,) show that the Chancery judges have considered themselves able to allow the short cut under the above section, in cases where infants interested have come into esse during the proceedings; but the cases in which the judges have felt themselves so empowered to act under the section seem to have been all cases in which nothing had been done since the infants came into esse. At any rate that appears to be the distinction now made as to the case of infants. In Capps v. Capps (L. R. 4 Ch. 1, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 137), an order for sale of realty had been made in an administration suit, and it was afterwards discovered that the heir-at-law of the testator in the suit was dead, having left two infants his own heirs. The Master of the Rolls did not feel able to make the supplemental order under the section in this case, and his refusal was confirmed by Lord Cairns. In the principal case of Auster v. Haines, after an administration decree had been made, a married woman, not party to the suit, but who had leave to attend the proceedings by her guardian, gave birth to two infants, and further proceedings were taken in the suit before this was discovered by the parties. Stuart, V.C., inclined to think that the case was within the meaning of the section, and repeated the decision in Capps v. Capps (ubi sup.); he declined, however, to make any order, and Lord Hatherley, on the matter being taken before him, said he could not depart from Capps v. Capps. But in the other principal case of Countess of Egremont v. Thompson, which was before Lord Hatherley simultaneously with Auster v. Haines, no proceedings had been taken in the suit since the birth of the infant. Lord Hatherley considered that in this case he might make the order, adding that such a case was rather within Lloyd v. Johns (9 Ves. 59, 60) than Capps v. Capps. The distinction thus seems to be (though it certainly appears to be a distinction without a difference) that where no proceedings have been taken since the infant's birth, the Court will make the order; if, however, proceedings should have been taken, a bill will be necessary.

REVIEWS.

Supplement to the Third Edition of Powell's Law of Evidence, containing alterations of the Law of Evidence effected by the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869, the Documentary Evidence Act, 1868, the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the Habitual Criminals Act, 1869, together with the leading Cases on the Law of Evidence decided since February, 1868. By JOHN CUTLER and EDMUND FULLER GRIFFIN, Barristers-at-Law. London: Butterworths, 1869.

We reviewed the work to which this is a supplement in April, 1868 (12 S. J. 519), and were then able to recommend it favourably to our readers. Several important statutes as to the law of evidence having been lately passed, the editors have issued them in this supplement, which we think will be found useful to practitioners. A short introductory chapter draws attention to the principal alterations effected by the statutes; then come short notes of cases recently decided, with references to the page of the original work at which the notes ought to be inserted, and then the Acts. The notes are the least satisfactory part; but as the recent cases on the subject are neither numerous nor very important, this is not of much consequence. Thus, a reference is given to Ryder v. Wombell (38 L. J. Ex. 8), as a decision of the Court of Exchequer on evidence of necessities. That reference is really to the report of the decision of the Exchequer Chamber reversing the Exchequer, and should have been so stated, as everyone who knew that the decision in the Exchequer had been reversed, would probably instead of referring to the place cited, search subsequent volumes in vain for the decision of the Exchequer Chamber. Again, Bauman v. James (L. R. 3 Ch. 508) is quoted as deciding something much more extensive than it really did, and as quoted appears rather a startling case. It is, however, as a handy print of the Acts that this supplement will be useful, and the inaccuracies in the notes will doubtless be amended before they are incorporated with the next edition of the whole work.

By the death of Mr. C. F. Rothery, the office of Assistant Justice and Judge of Common Pleas in the Bahama Islands has become vacant. The appointment is worth £650 per annum.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD.)

Nov. 20.—Ex parte Lublin, Re Lublin.

This was an appeal from an order made by one of the registrars of the Liverpool Court of Bankruptcy upon a trader-debtor summons.

Yate Lee was for the appellant.

De Gex, Q.C., for the respondents, took the preliminary objection that the appeal had not been brought within the twenty-one days limited by the statute.

Yate Lee contended that, as the appeal was by motion, the time when notice of motion was given was what was material, and not the entry of the appeal. He relied upon Re Redfern, 11 Jur. N. S. 311.

De Gex, Q.C., said that the report of that case in 13 W. R. 667, was different, and showed that what was done was by consent.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that there must be some mistake in the report in the Jurist, for so to decide would be to repeal section 12 of the Act of 1849, and to say that it had no application to appeals now they were made by way of motion. The appeal must be dismissed.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Nov. 25.—Master GEORGE POLLOCK read in open court the following rules, which have been passed for the practical working of the Debtors' Act, 1869, and which Act, together with the rules, are to come into operation on the 1st of January, 1870 :—

"In pursuance of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1857, and the Debtors' Act, 1869, it is ordered that, on and after the first day of January, 1870, the following rules shall be in force for regulating the practice under and carrying into effect the first part of the said Debtors' Act, 1870 :—

"1. All applications to commit to prison, under section 5, shall in the first instance be made by summons before a judge, which shall specify the date and other particulars of the judgment or order, for non-payment of which the application is made, together with the amount due, and be endorsed with the particulars required by rule 73 of Hilary Term, 1853.

"2. The service of summons whenever it shall be practicable shall be personal, but if it appear to the judge that reasonable efforts have been made to effect personal service, and either that the summons has come to the knowledge of the debtor, or that he wilfully evades service, an order may be made as if personal service had been effected upon such terms as to the judge may seem fit.

"3. Proof of the means of the debtor shall, whenever practicable, be given by affidavit, but if it appear to the judge either before or at the hearing that a voir dire examination either of the debtor or of any other person or the production of any document is necessary or expedient, an order may be made commanding the attendance of any such person before the judge at a time and place to be therein mentioned, for the purpose of being examined on oath touching the matter in question and for the production of any such document, subject to such terms and conditions as to the judge may seem fit. The disobedience to any such order shall be deemed a contempt of Court and punishable accordingly.

"4. The order of committal (which may be in form A in the schedule, or to the like effect) shall before delivery to the sheriff be endorsed with the particulars required by rule 73 of Hilary Term, 1853. Concurrent orders may be issued for execution in different counties. The sheriff and officers shall be entitled to the same fees in respect thereof as are now payable upon a capias satisfaciendum.

"5. Upon payment of the sum or sums mentioned in the order (including the sheriff's fees in like manner as upon a ca. sa.) the debtor shall be entitled to a certificate in form B in the schedule, or to the like effect, signed by the attorney in the cause, or signed by the creditor and attested by an attorney on his behalf.

"6. Orders to arrest under the 6th section (which may be in the form of C in the schedule, or to the like effect) shall be made upon an affidavit separate, but the defendant shall be at liberty at any time after the arrest to apply to rescind or vary the order, or to be discharged from custody, or for such other relief as may be just. Such orders shall, before delivery to the sheriff, be endorsed with the particulars required by rule 73 of Hilary Term, 1853. Concurrent orders may be issued for arrest in different counties. The sheriff and officer shall be entitled to the same fees in respect thereof as are now payable on a capias.

"7. The security to be given by the defendant may be a deposit in court of the amount mentioned in the order, or a bond to the plaintiff by the defendant and two sufficient sureties (or with leave of a judge more than two), or with the plaintiff's consent any other form of security. The plaintiff may, within four days after receiving particulars of the names and addresses of the proposed sureties, and the form of the proposed bond, give notice that he objects thereto, stating therein in what particulars, and in case of his so doing the sufficiency of the security shall be determined by the Master, who shall have the power to award the costs of such reference to either party. It shall be the plaintiff's duty to obtain an appointment for that purpose, and unless he does so within four days of giving notice of objection, the security shall be deemed sufficient.

"8. The money deposited and the security, and all proceedings thereon, shall be subject to the order and the control of the court or a judge.

"9. Unless otherwise ordered, the costs of and consequent on an order to arrest shall be costs of the cause.

"10. Upon payment into court of the amount mentioned in the order, a receipt shall be given by the proper officer, and upon receiving the bond or other security, a certificate to that effect shall be given, signed or attested by the plaintiff's attorney, and the delivery of such receipt or certificate to the sheriff shall entitle the defendant to be discharged out of custody.

"11. The sheriff or other officer named either in an order of committal or an order to arrest under the 6th section shall within two days after the arrest endorse on the order the true date of such arrest.

"A. E. COCKBURN.

"FITZROY KELLY."

COMMON LAW JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

Nov. 22.—Cox v. Williams.

This was an application on the part of the plaintiff, an executrix, to review Master Bennett's taxation of costs.

Mr. Neal (Neal and Philpott) appeared for the defendant.

Mr. Coote, for the plaintiff, declared that the master's taxation was "unfair."

WILLES, J., said after an allegation of misconduct he would not hear the application, and it must go before the Court.

Mr. Coote said he meant unfairness in the taxation.

His LORDSHIP must decline to hear the case. A charge of misconduct must be heard in public court.

Mr. Coote.—Would his Lordship allow him to show the circumstances under which he thought the taxation unfair?

His LORDSHIP referred him to the Court. He had ridden a very high horse, and must go to the Court.

(Before Sir R. PHILLIMORE.)

Nov. 23.—The Hickman: Judgment.The County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act.

This was an action for salvage services, and a tender was made of a sum slightly under £300, and two questions were for the judgment of the Court—whether, as the tender was accepted as sufficient, and the plaintiff had recovered a sum which he might have obtained under the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, and was therefore not entitled to costs without a certificate, that the cause was proper to be tried in the Admiralty Court, the Court should grant a certificate; and the second question was as to the manner in which the tender was made, leaving the question as to the costs to the Court.

His LORDSHIP allowed the plaintiff his costs, although he might have recovered in the county court, there having been questions of difficulty in the case, and the amount recovered having been only just within the jurisdiction of the County Court; and laid it down that in future a tender should state expressly whether it included costs, or whether the question of costs was left to the Court.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.
(Before Mr. Commissioner BACON.)

Nov. 24.—Re Ballardur.

In this case the bankrupt applied for an order of discharge.

Finlay Knight supported; the bankrupt was not opposed. Some time after the case had been disposed of a solicitor attended, and asked that it might be mentioned again. He said that the matter had been called on out of its turn.

Mr. Commissioner BACON.—I will not allow you to say that it was called out of its turn.

The solicitor said it stood last of the 11 o'clock cases on the list at the door of the Court, and his clients, who had come up from the country to oppose, were waiting outside for the name to be called. It was a very gross case, and the bankrupt knew that he would be opposed. He was prepared to show that the accounts were insufficient.

Mr. Commissioner BACON.—I agree with you that it is a very gross case when a solicitor who ought to be in attendance in court to watch his case loiters outside, and allows it to be called in his absence. The matter has been disposed of through your mere neglect. I have no power, and, if I had, I have not the slightest inclination, to call it again.

BANKRUPTCY COURT, BIRMINGHAM.

(Before Mr. Commissioner SANDERS.)

Nov 19.—Re W. C. Maltby, Stourbridge, Solicitor.

Mr. C. B. Hodgson appeared for the assignee, and Mr. Griffin for the bankrupt. On Friday, the 12th inst., the bankrupt, being examined, gave the following evidence:—"I never kept any books.—Upon your solemn oath, you say you never kept any books? I do.—Never? No.—Never kept books since you entered into business? No.—That you swear? I swear it." He afterwards said: "We kept a cash-book.—Q. Oh, you don't call that keeping books? A. I never noticed it: I did not believe in it.—Q. Did the clerks keep any? A. None except the cash-book."

Mr. Hodgson now produced Mr. Prince, who was formerly the bankrupt's managing clerk at Dudley. He also produced about a dozen account books—diary, day book, ledger, bill book, letter book, bankruptcy book, &c. Mr. Prince swore that these books were kept in the bankrupt's office in Dudley up to 1865, and that the bankrupt's own handwriting was in "several of them."

Mr. Hodgson submitted to the Court that the bankrupt had clearly committed perjury. It was shown that he kept books up to 1865, although he swore that he never kept any; and that being so, the Court would no doubt disbelieve his oath that he had not kept books since 1865. On debts of £1,608 there was a nominal deficiency of £1,322; but the real deficiency would be nearly £1,600.

Mr. Griffin said he would say nothing as to the perjury—that was not a matter to be dealt with in the Bankruptcy Court. He contended, however, that the bankrupt had not committed any offence under the Bankruptcy Act.

The Commissioner said the bankrupt's character suffered most severely from the exposure, and he wished he could punish him; but the order of discharge must be granted.

Mr. Hodgson said the assignee intended to prosecute the bankrupt for perjury.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. FREDERICK JAMES SMITH, Barrister-at-law, of the Home Circuit, has been appointed by the Home Secretary to be the first Recorder of the Borough of Margate. Mr. Smith was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1843, and practices at the various sessions in the county of Kent, and in the West Kent local courts.

Mr. CHARLES BERKELEY MARGETTS, solicitor, of Huntingdon, has been appointed Registrar of the Huntingdon County Court, in succession to his father, Mr. Charles Margetts, who has resigned on account of ill-health. Mr. C. B. Margetts, who was certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1852, only recently succeeded his father as coroner for Huntingdon and as clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes for that borough.

Mr. GEORGE BRAXTON ALDRIDGE, solicitor, has been appointed Undersheriff of Poole, Dorsetshire, for the ensuing year. Mr. Aldridge, who was certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1861, also fills the office of Clerk of the Peace and Coroner for the borough.

Mr. FREDERICK CORNETT solicitor, has been appointed Undersheriff of the city of Worcester, for the ensuing year.

Mr. ARTHUR BURCH, solicitor, of Exeter, has been appointed Secretary to Dr. Temple, the Bishop-elect of that diocese. Mr. Burch was a few months ago nominated to succeed the late Mr. Ralph Barnes, as secretary to the late Dr. Philpotts, by whose successor he has now been re-appointed.

Mr. WILLIAM THOMAS BENSLEY, LL.D., solicitor, of Norwich, has been appointed, by the Dean of Norwich, to be Chapter Clerk, in succession to the late Mr. John Kitson. Mr. Bensley, who was recently appointed secretary to the Lord Bishop of Norwich, matriculated at London University in 1852, from King's College, and graduated as B.A. in 1854; he was elected a Bachelor of Laws in 1864, and received the degree of LL.D. in 1866.

Mr. CONSTANTINE BURKE, principal of the firm of Burke, Brothers, solicitors, of Kingston, Jamaica, has been appointed Crown Solicitor to the Government of that island, in the room of Mr. A. W. Aikman, deceased.

Mr. T. W. BROGDEN, B.A., barrister-at-law, of Lincoln's-inn, and a member of the Midland Circuit, has been nominated to a Law Studentship at St. John's College, Cambridge.

Mr. EDWARD STRATHEARN GORDON, Q.C., of the Scotch Bar, has been elected to represent the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen in Parliament, in succession to the Right Hon. James Moncreiff, now Lord Justice Clerk. Mr. Gordon, who filled the office of Lord Advocate under Mr. Disraeli's Government, was a candidate for the representation of the united universities at the last general election, when he was defeated by a very small majority.

Mr. GEORGE BILLER, of 14, Golden-square, Westminster, has been appointed a London Commissioner to administer oaths in the Courts of Chancery and Common Law.

Mr. EDWARD FRENCH BUTTNER HARSTON, of 16, King-street, Cheapside, has been appointed a London Commissioner for administering oaths in the Courts of Common Law.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

SOLICITORS' ACCOUNTS.

Sir,—I ask permission to reply to the letter of your correspondent who signs himself "A Law Accountant and Costs Draftsman." I should imagine he learnt his business in Messrs. Kain & Co.'s office, judging by several allusions which are caecare to the general. He speaks of what their articulated pupils do. Now few outsiders would know that they took articulated pupils; still fewer would have known or cared how such pupils performed their duties. Further, Mr. Kain is spoken of as a professor of statistics—whatever that may mean in his office, the title is elsewhere unknown; still further, the writer uses with quotation marks the word "boldly." Now unless this word be a cant phrase in the office its use is ridiculous. There are other words quoted which may also be cant phrases, otherwise their use is silly. And thus again the writer's bitterness of tone may be accounted for in a measure, by the propensity some have of endeavouring to kick down the ladder by which they have risen. The writer, who thus appears to know so much about Mr. Kain's office, ought to have known that he is the author of three systems, not one only, as implied. In one of these, at least, there ought to be no difficulty, as that contains only one column on each side of the cash book (or cash journal, as Mr. Kain appropriately calls it). Another plan contains two columns on each side, while the third has three columns or more. It is the latter, I suppose, to which the writer refers in such silly and exaggerated terms. I have had the triple column system (so called) in use in my office for many years. I found it easy of acquirement and simple to understand, and most certainly I have derived great benefit from its adoption, being able, at any time, with little difficulty, to know how I stand with myself, my business, and my clients, both individually and collectively. The firm of law accountants of which Mr. Kain is the senior partner is too well known to require adventitious aid, and it may be that their letter, which has so roused the bile of their anonymous opponent in business, was looked upon by him as a puff. For my own part, I confess, it would be better for them in future to avoid writing on subjects necessitating a reference to their systems of book-keeping, which, having been so long before the profession, are sufficiently well known to stand on their own merits. They will thus escape the attacks of "rival" "Law Accountants and Costs Draftsmen."

A SOLICITOR.

THE LAW OF DISTRESS FOR RENT.

Sir,—I think you have slightly misapprehended some portions of my letter of last week in the Journal on this subject. You ascribe to me the opinion that "the present law of distress should be abolished, and the landlord left to his action;" if you will turn to the commencement of my letter you will find that what I said was that "occasionally cases happen which show that he is really worse off than he would be if left to the ordinary remedy of an action."

If you will refer to my last paragraph you will see that I do not propose to abolish the landlord's right to distrain, but to hedge it round with restrictions such as would render it extremely difficult if not next to impossible for a fictitious claimant to property to assert his claim by what I cannot help considering the clumsy expedient (for such a purpose) of a distress warrant as the law now stands. My proposition then is that when a landlord finds it necessary to enforce payment of his rent by legal process he should go through some such form as this. He should apply to a police court or a county court, either by himself or his duly authorised agent or brokers, that he should exhibit his warrant of distress and deposit with the court an affidavit that he is the landlord in actual possession of the premises upon which he seeks to distrain, and stating the amount of rent due and the term for which it is due. Thereupon the magistrate or judge or registrar should countersign the warrant and order the seal of the court to be affixed, when the document should have all the force of the present distress warrant which is issued on the mere motion of the landlord alone. One of the effects of this would be that a false claimant would, before he could distrain, have to commit perjury in an affidavit, and thus render himself liable to four years' penal servitude, or he would have to forge the seal of the court and the name of the official signing the warrant, for which offences he would be liable to similar punishment. The landlord would be in little fear of false claimants in the face of such penalties, and even a claimant with a doubtful or good claim would prefer to test it by an action rather than run such risks; the tenant who is now made a sort of buffer between the contending parties—a corpus vile, over whose prostrate form the battle is fought out always to his disadvantage, would be no party to a struggle in which he ought to have no interest, but in which he is generally the chief sufferer whoever wins.

One word as to the rarity of fictitious claims, and the difficulty of getting brokers to undertake to enforce them. The Government Returns, as far as I know, do not give the figures relating to replevins, but I have data before me which will afford some clue to the facts. My data refer to about one-fourth of London, and include a period of about twelve years down to the present date, and I find that we have about ten replevin warrants per annum, or forty for the whole of the metropolis—that is, assuming that the south of London is about the same as other portions in this respect. And supposing again, that the rest of England and Wales are similar to that of London we have in round numbers about 240 replevin warrants per annum. Following out this process of applying my particular data to the general case—a process doubtless fatal to some calculations but tolerably trustworthy in this—I find that the claimants are almost invariably found to be wrong when the cases are tried. Probably five per cent. substantiate their claims, and the rest are shams. It thus follows that considerably over 200 tenants are distrained on annually by persons to whom the tenants are under no legal obligation whatever to pay rent, and over 200 landlords are harassed by claims which turn out to be purely fictitious. It is no doubt true that these cases are considerably less than they would be if brokers had no fear of actions for trespass before their eyes, but there are brokers to be found (I write with no disrespect to the great body of them) who have no more fear of actions-at-law than they have scruples of conscience. This is sufficiently proved by the fact—I think I may assume it as a fact—that brokers are found to execute every year more than 200 doubtful and sham warrants of distress. Thus you see that what you speak of as something that only "might be," is occurring about four times a week.

I do not deny the possibility of any process of law being imitated or forged, but, after a tolerably long experience, I have never heard of a county court or a police court, or, indeed, a warrant of any court being forged. The difficulty and danger, as well as the expense, are too great, and I am strongly impressed with the opinion that if the warrant of distress for rent were required to be in some such official form as I have suggested, the 200 false claims to property per annum would nearly, if not entirely, cease to be made.

H. R.

P.S.—As a matter of information, I may add that in the case I described in my former letter the old woman and her two brokers have been committed by the Lambeth Police Court for trial at the ensuing Surrey Sessions. The magistrate at first refused to entertain the case at all, and referred the landlord to the county court, telling him he must replevy. On the uselessness of that process in such a case being pointed out to him he allowed summonses to issue, and ultimately committed all three for trial, accepting, however, their own bail. It seems strange that a case of so much public importance should have found no place in the general newspapers.—H. R.

IMPORTANT TO FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

Sir,—A paragraph has been going the round of the papers, headed as above, to the effect that the Registrar of Friendly Societies in England lately told a deputation representing various benefit societies, that a lunatic member could not claim sick pay, on the ground of illness. In support of this dictum he is said to have cited R. v. Manchester, and R. v. Huddersfield. The first of these is reported 6 E. & B. 919, 5 W. R. 20; 2 Jur. N. S. 1205; the second I have been unable to discover, at least, I have not found any case of that name in any way bearing on the point. R. v. Manchester turned upon the question whether lunacy was "sickness" within the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 4, so as to render a pauper irremovable; and it was held that it was not. But it seems to me that this case did not decide broadly that lunacy was not sickness in contemplation of law, but merely that it was not sickness within the meaning of the particular statute in question. Surely, upon every principle of justice, lunacy ought to be considered as sickness sufficient to entitle the patient to sick pay. The registrar, however, thinks differently, and says that the officers of any society paying money in such a case, would be guilty of a misappropriation of the funds, and would be liable to be prosecuted for doing so. Will some of your readers give their opinion on this question?

Nov. 23rd, 1869.

H. F. A. D.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Thursday, Nov. 25.

Term ends this day, and nothing of importance has occurred in our legal circles. The Mastership of the Rolls is still vacant; the business of that court is practically at a standstill, and will now, in all probability, continue so until the beginning of next term. It seems to have been for some time back taken for granted that the appointment will be accepted by the Attorney-General, the Right Honourable Edward Sullivan, M.P. for Mallow Borough, and it is understood that the delay in making the appointment is owing to political exigencies requiring him to continue for some time longer at his post of chief law officer of the Government. His appointment will give very general satisfaction. At our Chancery bar he had for several years occupied a prominent place, until called away by his Parliamentary duties; and for many years before he had occupied a leading position upon the Munster Circuit at the outer, and subsequently at the inner, bar. He will doubtless carry with him to the bench that untiring industry and lawyerlike spirit which have so long characterised him, and prove a worthy successor of him whose untimely death we all deplore.

In the event of the Attorney-General's elevation to the bench, it is thought that as the present Solicitor-General, who will take his place, is without a seat in the House, some one of our legal M.P.'s must be appointed Solicitor-General. Rumour is rife, but Mr. Serjeant Dowse, M.P. for Derry, and David Sherlock, Q.C., M.P. for the King's County are unquestionably the favourites.

The City of Dublin Election Commissioners, Hugh Law, Q.C., chairman, Edward Tandy, Q.C., and Mr. William O'Connor Morris, are to hold their first setting on the 29th inst.

During the last ten days, the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer were respectively engaged for some time in disposing of a series of motions of a somewhat novel character. Upon one day a number amounting in all, to fifteen writs of summons and plaint were issued out of our three law courts at the suit of a person named Bramble, against Major Knox, the proprietor of the Irish Times, for the recovery of fifteen penalties of £50 created by a recent Act, for the publication in his newspaper of advertisements offering rewards for the recovery of missing property, and guaranteeing that no questions should be asked of the person restoring the articles in question. For instance—£5 reward.—Lost, coming out of the Rotundo last Tuesday night 12th, a gold watch and chain. If left at Mr. M. Dowell's, 2, Henry-street, the above reward will be given and no questions asked."

Each of these writs was not only issued on one day, but was at the suit of the same person, was signed by the same attorney and counsel, and, for all that appeared to the contrary, the whole fifteen causes of action might have been included in one writ of summons and plaint in pursuance of the Common Law Procedure Amendment (Ireland) Act, 1852. Two writs had been issued in the Court of Queen's Bench, six in the Court of Common Pleas, and five in the Court of Exchequer. Counsel for the defendant, Major Knox, therefore moved each of the three Courts to consolidate the actions brought in each respectively. The motions were substantially granted in all three Courts, the orders varying merely as to the form of the order; and in the Common Pleas and Exchequer, the Courts marked their sense of the oppressive character of the proceedings by giving the costs of the motion against the plaintiff.

OBITUARY.

MR. JUSTICE HAYES.

It is with extreme regret that we record the death of Mr. Justice Hayes, who expired on Wednesday night. On Friday Sir G. Hayes was in court, and apparently in his usual health. He heard a summons in his private room, and was leaving for his home at Esher when he was seized with what at first was supposed to be paralysis or apoplexy. He scarcely rallied at all and died at Westminster Palace Hotel, to which he had been removed after the seizure. Sir G. Hayes was educated at Highgate and the Roman Catholic College at Ware, Herts. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1830, received the coif in 1856, and in 1860 was granted a patent of precedence to rank next after Mr. A. J. Stephens, Q.C. Not long after this he became Recorder of Leicester. He was the leader of the old Midland Circuit, but under the re-arranged circuit gave way to Mr. Overend, Q.C. When three new Common Law Judges were appointed, under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, Serjeant Hayes became a Justice of the Queen's Bench. It is not too much to say that no judicial appointment ever gave more general satisfaction. Serjeant Hayes was the most genial and popular of men, both on his circuit and off it. In addition to this he was a scholar and a sound lawyer. As a humorist he had few equals. To describe him as an habitual joker would be an utter inaccuracy; his wit was of the character indicated in Mr. Henry Taylor's assertion that a truly humorous mind is always a grave one,—an assertion, indeed, which amounts to a truism. The late judge never took any active part in politics. He married in 1839 a Miss Hale, of Leicester, by whom he leaves a family of four sons and a daughter. The cause of his death proved to be the rupture of a blood-vessel in the brain.

MR. C. F. ROTHERY.

We have to announce the death of Mr. Charles Frederick Rothery, Assistant-Judge and Acting Chief Justice of the Bahama Islands, which took place at Nassau on the 19th of October, of yellow fever. In January, 1847, he was appointed a Commissioner in the Mixed British and Portuguese Slave Trade Commission established at Boa Vista, in the Cape de Verd Islands, under the provisions of the treaty signed at Lisbon in July, 1842. When the office was abolished in January, 1852, Mr. Rothery obtained a compensation allowance from the Foreign Office; but a few years ago he was nominated by the Colonial Office authorities to be Assistant-Justice and Judge of Common Pleas in the Bahama Islands, and has lately been acting as Chief Justice during the absence of Mr. Doyle.

MR. HENRY PRITCHARD, JUN.

The death of Mr. Henry Pritchard, jun., barrister-at-law, of Trescawen, Co. Anglesey, took place on the 13th November, after a long and painful illness, at the early age of thirty-two years. The deceased gentleman was the eldest son and heir of Mr. Henry Pritchard, of Trescawen, a magistrate, and deputy-lieutenant of Anglesey, by Martha, daughter of J. Moulds, Esq., of Brynddyfryn. He was born in 1838, and received his education at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1860. He was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in November, 1865, but does not seem to have practised.

MR. ROWLAND PRICE.

This gentleman, a solicitor, of Stourbridge, Worcestershire, died suddenly on the 15th November, of heart-disease. Mr. Price took out his certificate as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1836, and was a member of the Incorporated Law Society. He occupied a high position in Stourbridge as a public man; he took the initiatory step in obtaining the new Town Act, under which that place is governed, and it was a proposition of his to go to Parliament for an Act to govern the greater part of the parish of Kingswinford that led the neighbouring parishes of Quarry-bank and Brierley-hill to adopt the Local Government Act of 1858. Mr. Price was a Conservative registration agent for West Staffordshire.

THE FUSION OF LAW AND EQUITY.*

It would be difficult to say anything new on the subject of the fusion of law and equity. And as the Judicature Commissioners have reported in favour of such fusion, it is hardly necessary to enforce it by argument. Nevertheless, now that the whole subject has been brought into a focus, it may be useful to bring together the valuable matter which has been collected, and to reduce it into small and readable compass. In doing this, I propose to avail myself of much printed matter; but this, except some extracts from the Commissioners' report, will be new to most of those now present.

The Incorporated Law Society and the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association took a leading part in bringing facts and arguments before the Commissioners. Each society selected members of its governing body, who joined together as an associated committee, presided over by Mr. Frere as President of the Incorporated Law Society. This committee invited written and oral communications from its members, and these, when received, formed a basis for the consideration subsequently given to the subject. The associated committee ultimately came to a series of resolutions suggesting the continuance of the existing system of courts, with improvements to assimilate and harmonize them by degrees, and they compiled tables showing the points of difference between the procedure of various courts. I may be permitted to express my regret that I was not enabled, at an earlier period, to bring before the associated committee a series of proposed resolutions, with reasons, enforcing the fusion of law and equity, which were culled from the communications which have been mentioned, and, as I think, expressed the views of a considerable majority of those who made them. From the favourable opinions which were expressed as to my resolutions when they were brought forward, I may venture to say that, at least, they would have raised interesting discussions. But the associated committee had already adopted the leading principles of the resolutions ultimately passed; and I was too late. I sent my proposed resolutions to the Commissioners, with the assent of the associated committee, and I trust I shall not be deemed guilty of egotism when I say that the main points of my proposed resolutions and of the report of the Commissioners are much alike.

In the communication which I originally made to the associated committee the origin of the double system of law and equity was stated as follows:—

Blackstone tells us that the distinction between law and equity, as administered in different courts, was not known, nor seemed ever to have been known, in any other country than our own. He adds, that the difference of one from the other, when administered by the same tribunals, was familiar to the Romans, the Jus Prætorium, or discretion of the Prætor, being distinct from the Leges, or standing laws; but the power of both centered in one and the same magistrate, who was equally intrusted to pronounce the rule of law, and to apply it to particular cases by the principles of equity (Comm. III. 50).

In England Courts of Equity seem to have had their origin in the strictness with which the Courts of Law confined themselves to the king's original writs, or forms of procedure, occasioning harsh and imperfect judgments. The injured suitor thereupon applied to the king for redress, and the king referred it to his Chancellor to devise a new writ, or mode of procedure, to meet the equity of the case. After a time, the separate jurisdiction of the Chancery, as a Court of Equity, began to be established, and the invention by ecclesiastics (desirous of legitimating conveyances of land for the benefit of their order, by way of use or trust) of the writ of subpœna, which compelled the examination on oath of the defendant, gave to the Chancellor a new and peculiar power. The assistance of this power naturally attracted all those cases in which the private knowledge of the defendant rendered his examination on oath desirable. Thus were brought to the Chancellor's court cases of trust, discovery, and fraud. By-and-bye the forms of the court gave facilities for inquiring into matters of account, of partnership, of administering the estates of deceased persons, and other like matters, in which the masters of the court, meeting the parties familiarly in their chambers, were enabled to make enquiries into matters of detail, on which they reported, thereby enabling the judge to give the necessary directions.

The Courts of Equity, thus established, formed a system of procedure for themselves, different from that of the Courts of Law. I cannot find any peculiar merit in this system to require its perpetuation as a separate system. Resulting from the narrow forms and strict rules of the Courts of Law, and from the greed of churchmen, our Courts of Equity served their purpose in our earlier history. In time the reasons which led to their separate formation ceased; while they themselves remained. It cannot be denied that their peculiar mode of procedure has since been productive of benefit to the suitor, but it is a benefit which can be administered by one court acting as an amalgamated Court of Law and Equity. The existence of two sets of courts, with different systems, must be an inconvenience and an evil.

My paper then proceeded to describe the course of modern legislation in attempting to give remedies to suitors without driving them from one court to another; but the report of the Commissioners contains a better description than mine, and I therefore quote from thence in preference:—

"The evils of this double system of judicature, and the confusion and conflict of jurisdiction to which it has led, have been long known and acknowledged.

"The subject engaged the attention of the Commissioners appointed in 1851 to inquire into the constitution of the Court of Chancery. Those learned Commissioners, after pointing out some of the defects in the administration of justice arising out of the conflicting systems of procedure and modes of redress adopted by the Courts of Common Law and Equity respectively, state their opinion that 'a practical and effectual remedy for many of the evils in question may be found in such a transfer or blending of jurisdiction, coupled with such other practical amendments, as will render each court competent to administer complete justice in the cases which fall under its cognisance.'

"In like manner the Commissioners appointed in 1850 to inquire into the constitution of the Common Law Courts make, in their second report, a very similar recommendation. They report that 'it appeared to them that the Courts of Common Law, to be able satisfactorily to administer justice, ought to possess in all matters within their jurisdiction the power to give all the redress necessary to protect and vindicate common law rights, and to prevent wrongs, whether existing or likely to happen unless prevented'; and further that 'a consolidation of all the elements of a complete remedy in the same court was obviously desirable, not to say imperatively necessary, to the establishment of a consistent and rational system of procedure.'

"In consequence of these reports several Acts of Parliament have been passed for the purpose of carrying out to a limited extent the recommendations of the Commissioners.

"By virtue of these Acts the Court of Chancery is now, not only empowered, but bound to decide for itself all questions of common law, without having recourse, as formerly, to the aid of a Common Law Court, whether such questions arise incidentally in the course of the suit, or constitute the foundation of a suit, in which a more effectual remedy is sought for the violation of a common law right, or a better protection against its violation than can be had at common law. The Court is further empowered to take evidence orally in open court, and in certain cases to award damages for breaches of contract or wrongs as at common law; and trial by jury—the great distinctive feature of the common law—has recently, for the first time, been introduced into the Court of Chancery.

"On the other hand, the Courts of Common Law are now authorised to compel discovery in all cases in which a Court of Equity would have enforced it in a suit instituted for the purpose. A limited power has been conferred on Courts of Common Law to grant injunctions, and to allow equitable defences to be pleaded, and in certain cases to grant relief from forfeitures. These changes, however, fall far short of the recommendations of the Common Law Commissioners, who in their final report expressed the opinion, that power should be conferred on the Common Law Courts 'to give, in respect of rights there recognised, all the protection and redress which at present can be obtained in any jurisdiction.'

"The alterations to which we have referred have no doubt introduced considerable improvements into the procedure both of the Common Law and Equity Courts; but, after a careful consideration of the subject, and judging now with the advantage of many years' experience of the practical working of the systems actually in force, we are of opinion that 'the transfer or blending of jurisdiction' attempted to be carried out by recent Acts of Parliament, even if it had been adopted to the full extent recommended by the Commissioners, is not a sufficient or adequate remedy for the evils complained of, and would at best have mitigated but not removed the most prominent of those evils.

"The authority now possessed by the Court of Chancery to decide for itself all questions of common law has no doubt worked beneficially. But the mode of taking evidence orally before an examiner, instead of before the judge who has to decide the case, has justly caused much dissatisfaction; and trial by jury,—whether from the reluctance of the judge or of the counsel to adopt such an innovation, or from the complexity of the issues generally involved in the suit, or because the proceedings in chancery do not give rise to so many conflicts of evidence as proceedings in other courts,—has been attempted in comparatively few cases.

"In the Common Law Courts the power to compel discovery has been extensively used, and has proved most salutary; but the jurisdiction conferred on those courts to grant injunctions and to allow equitable defences to be pleaded has been so limited and restricted,—the former extending only to cases where there has been an actual violation of the right, and the latter being confined to those equitable defences where the Court of Chancery would have granted a perpetual and unconditional injunction,—that these remedies have not been of much practical use at common law, and suitors have consequently been obliged to resort to the Court of Chancery, as before, for the purpose of obtaining a complete remedy.

"Much therefore of the old mischief still remains, notwithstanding the changes which have been introduced; and the Court of Chancery necessarily continues to exercise the jurisdiction of restraining actions at law on equitable grounds, and even claims to exercise that jurisdiction in cases where an equitable defence might be properly pleaded at common law."

"It may be further observed, in illustration of the evils of the double procedure, that whenever a new class of business arises, such as the litigation arising out of railway and other joint-stock companies, proceedings, frequently of an experimental character, are commenced both at law and in equity by different suitors, leading to the inconvenience of protracted litigation, and the danger of conflicting judgments. We may refer to the litigation lately pending between the sellers of railway shares and the jobbers on the Stock Exchange, by which the sellers sought to obtain an indemnity from the jobbers against calls. The litigation began in a Court of Common Law. A suit in equity soon followed, by a different plaintiff against the same defendants, both suits asking for similar redress. The Court of Common Law decided in favour of the plaintiff. The Court of Equity shortly after delivered judgment to the same effect. The defendants appealed in both suits; in the one case to the Exchequer Chamber, in the other to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. Both appeals were pending at the same time, but there was no official machinery by which the Judges of Appeal in Chancery and the Court of Exchequer Chamber could enter into communication with the view of arriving at a common result. The Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed the judgment of the Court below; the Court of Appeal in Chancery, acting independently of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, arrived at the same conclusion, and about the same time delivered its judgment, reversing the decision of the Vice-Chancellor. The defendants were thus subjected to litigation (at the instance, no doubt, of different parties), carried on at the same time in different courts, and exposed to the risk of conflicting decisions, those courts operating under different forms of procedure, and being controlled by different Courts of Appeal.

"The litigation arising out of joint-stock companies has constituted a very large proportion of the business which has engaged the attention of Courts of Law and Equity for some years. Directors of joint-stock companies fill the double character of agents and trustees for the companies and shareholders; and the effect of their acts and representations has frequently been brought into question in both jurisdictions, and sometimes with opposite results. The expense thus needlessly incurred has been so great, and the perplexity thereby occasioned in the conduct of business so considerable, as to convince most persons, who have followed the development of this branch of the law, of the necessity that exists for a tribunal invested with full power of dealing with all the complicated rights and obligations springing out of such transactions, and of administering complete and appropriate relief, no matter whether the rights and obligations involved are what are called legal or equitable.

"The present state of the county courts may also be appropriately referred to, as exhibiting the strange working of a system of separate jurisdictions, even when exercised by the same court.

"The county court has jurisdiction in common law cases, up to £50 in contracts, and to £10 in torts. It has also equitable jurisdiction in certain cases when the value of the property in dispute does not exceed £500, and in at least one of such cases—namely, an administration suit, it is now competent for any county court judge to restrain the prosecution of actions brought by creditors in any of the Superior Courts of Common Law. By an Act of Parliament of last session some of the county courts have also been invested with Admiralty jurisdiction in a large class of cases where the amount in dispute does not exceed, in some cases £150 and in others £300. There is an appeal in each class of cases, within certain limits, to a Court of Common Law, to the Court of Chancery, or to the Court of Admiralty. But these jurisdictions, though conferred on the same court and the same judge, still remain (like the common law and equity sides of the old Court of Exchequer) quite distinct and separate. The judge has no power to administer in one and the same suit any combination of the different remedies which belong to his three jurisdictions, however convenient or appropriate such redress may be. That can only be accomplished, under the county court system, by three distinct suits brought in the same court and before the same judge, carried on under three different forms of procedure, and controlled by three different courts of appeal. In this case therefore, although we appear at first sight to have obtained that great desideratum, which the Common Law Commissioners call 'the consolidation of all the elements of a complete remedy in the same court,' yet, as that remedy can only be had in three separate suits, the evil is equally great."

I return to my paper for a short statement as to the existing state of things.

My conclusion then is that inconvenience still arises from the separation. Parliament, by its assimilation of the proceedings of either court to those of the other, has admitted the existence of past inconvenience, and has attempted to remedy it. In so doing it has given co-ordinate jurisdiction over similar subject matter to the two systems, which still in many things preserve their original forms. Chancery commences her proceedings with a common sense statement of facts, by bill or petition, followed by a common sense defence by answer. Common law commences by formal declaration and plea, which convey no information to any mind but a legal one. And so when Mr. Skimpin, in the action of Bardwell v. Pickwick, had proceeded to "open the case," the case appeared to have very little inside when he had opened it, he having kept such particulars as he knew completely to himself, leaving the jury, after a lapse of three minutes, in precisely the same state of advanced wisdom as they were in before. Courts of Equity having achieved the distinction of permitting the parties to state their respective cases in a plain way, which all can understand, relapse into anti-common sense, by taking evidence in the shape of an affidavit, or before an examiner, who is not to hear the cause. In the one case the witnesses but too frequently adopt what has been prepared for them by another person (to wit, the solicitor's clerk), in language not their own, and with every variety of suggestion which leading questions can offer. In the other case it is left to the judge to sift the evidence of persons whom he has never seen, without any opportunity of noticing their demeanour, without the actual question and answer, and without having before him all those minutiae which the personal contact of judge and witness alone can give. Courts of Law, on the other hand, beginning at this point to induce principles of common sense, adopt the natural proceeding of bringing the witness in person before the very tribunal which is to sift and decide on his evidence."

It must surely be an inconvenience to have two such separate systems.

Among the reasons for fusion, as given in my proposed resolutions, epitomising the communications of the various members of the associated committee, were the following:—

There is an universal feeling that, as expressed in Mr. Ford's paper, few would wish to establish the existing distinct departments of law and equity, if called upon to form a system of jurisprudence on a tabula rasa; or, as expressed in Mr. Burton's paper, that, if we were now for the first time establishing a system of jurisprudence for a new country, it would never be suggested that two sets of antagonistic courts, and systems of law, and modes of procedure, should be established;

Manifold inconveniences arise from the separation of the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law and Equity, amongst which may be mentioned, as expressed in Mr. Bircham's paper;

(a) That the matter to be disposed of by our courts, litigant and non-litigant, is, beyond all precedent, extensive;

(b) That it is not unfrequently the case (even when the jurisdiction is clear) that the whole of one entire service, right, or remedy, is incapable of being obtained by application to one and the same court;

(c) That the separate jurisdictions of the courts, to a certain extent, conflict; that is to say, in the exercise of their respective functions, different courts give to the suitor contrary results in respect of substantially the same subject-matter;

(d) That there are cases in which there is real doubt as to which of the courts has jurisdiction;—

Such doubts being exemplified, in Mr. Burton's paper, by the recent cases of the holders of land whose property has been taken from them by insolvent railway companies, there being reported cases of ejectments against the company at law which failed; and of cases in chancery which were at first equally unsuccessful;

And such inconveniences being exemplified—

By Mr. Gregory's instance of a lease, where the lessee became bankrupt, thereby forfeiting his lease, but continued to hold on, and gave notice of sale, which was in breach of a covenant in the lease—and the remedies of the lessor were: 1. An ejectment at law to recover possession; 2. A suit in chancery for an injunction to prevent the sale; with, 3. The chance, if the injunction order was upset on appeal, of an action by the bankrupt or his assignees for damage by reason of the stopping of the sale;

And, by Mr. Bromley's instances, of the necessity still existing of sometimes applying to equity for an injunction against an action at law, arising from the incapacity of the Court of Law to do complete justice in cases where a perpetual injunction would not be granted in equity; and of the incapacity of a Court of Law to grant specific performance, and also of its incapacity to give any specific judgment against a specific fund, or any other judgment (except under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 2, and under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854) than one for damages;

The benefits of the separation of the jurisdiction of Courts of Law and Equity are confined, as expressed in Mr. Bircham's paper, to the superiority of knowledge and experience assumed to be obtained by those who apply themselves exclusively to separate branches of our system of laws; but that such division of labour, and its attendant advantages, might be secured (as also expressed by Mr. Bircham) though the tribunals might not be separate, inasmuch as the transaction of the business of any universal court would naturally be so divided by arrangement among its members that there would be, in practice, branches of the court before which it would be found convenient, or made necessary, that business of particular classes should be conducted, and thus the peculiar aptitude of the judges and a bar to deal with such classes be preserved;

The separation of the jurisdiction of Courts of Law and Equity, as expressed in Mr. Janson's paper, generally ancillary to, but sometimes conflicting with, one another, is eminently irrational and unsatisfactory, presenting an anomaly which can only be explained by reference to the history of our law, and being, in short, an anachronism.

The Commissioners state their conclusions as follows:—

We are of opinion that the defects above adverted to cannot be completely remedied by any mere transfer or blending of jurisdiction between the courts as at present constituted; and that the first step towards meeting and surmounting the evils complained of will be the consolidation of all the Superior Courts of Law and Equity, together with the Courts of Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty, into one Court, to be called "Her Majesty's Supreme Court," in which Court shall be vested all the jurisdiction which is now exercisable by each and all the courts so consolidated.

This consolidation would at once put an end to all conflicts of jurisdiction. No suitor could be defeated because he commenced his suit in the wrong court, and sending the suitor from equity to law or from law to equity, to begin his suit over again in order to obtain redress, will be no longer possible.

The Supreme Court thus constituted would of course be divided into as many chambers or divisions as the nature and extent or the convenient despatch of business might require.

All suits, however, should be instituted in the Supreme Court, and not in any particular chamber or division of it; and each chamber or division should possess all the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court with respect to the subject-matter of the suit, and with respect to every defence which may be made thereto, whether on legal or equitable grounds, and should be enabled to grant such relief or to apply such remedy or combination of remedies as may be appropriate or necessary in order to do complete justice between the parties in the case before the Court, or, in other words, such remedies as all the present Courts combined have now jurisdiction to administer.

"We consider it expedient, with a view to facilitate the transition from the old to the new system, and to make the proposed change at first as little inconvenient as possible, that the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer should for the present retain their distinctive titles, and should constitute so many chambers or divisions of the Supreme Court; and as regards the Courts of Admiralty, Divorce and Probate, we think it would be convenient that those courts should be consolidated, and form one chamber or division of the Supreme Court.

We further recommend that in order to prepare for any changes that may hereafter be thought expedient in the constitution of these chambers or divisions of the Supreme Court, all future judicial and other appointments therein should be made subject to the possibility of such changes.

Between the several chambers or divisions of the Supreme Court so constituted it would be necessary to make such a classification of business as might seem desirable with reference to the nature of the suits and the relief to be sought or administered therein, and the ordinary distribution of business among the different chambers or divisions should be regulated according to such classification. For the same reason which induces us to recommend the retention for the present of the distinctive titles of the different courts in their new character, as so many divisions of the Supreme Court, we think that such classification should in the first instance be made on the principle of assigning as nearly as practicable to those chambers or divisions such suits as would now be commenced in the respective courts as at present constituted; with power, however, to the Supreme Court to vary or alter this classification in such manner as may from time to time be deemed expedient.

It should further be competent for any chamber or division of the Supreme Court to order a suit to be transferred at any stage of its progress to any other chamber or division of the Court, if it appears that justice can thereby be more conveniently done in the suit; but except for the purpose of obtaining such transfer, it should not be competent for any party to object to the prosecution of any suit in the particular chamber or division in which it is being prosecuted, on the ground that it ought to have been brought or prosecuted in some other chamber or division of the Court. When such transfer has been made, the chamber or division to which the suit has been so transferred will take up the suit at the stage to which it had advanced in the first chamber, and proceed thenceforward to dispose of it in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the chamber or division to which it was transferred.

From the consolidation of all the present Superior Courts into one Supreme Court, it follows that all the judges of those courts will become judges of the Supreme Court; and thus every judge (with the exception of those who are to sit exclusively in the Appellate Court hereinafter recommended), though belonging to a particular division, will be competent to sit in any other division of the court whenever it may be found convenient for the administration of justice.

Time does not permit me to pursue the subject into detail. The Commissioners set forth very clearly a series of recommendations for the procedure of the amalgamated court, and I cannot find any flaw in them.

I trust that many years will not pass over us without seeing the report of the Commissioners carried into effect by Act of Parliament.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on Tuesday, 23rd inst., Mr. Hepburn in the chair, the following question was discussed.—"Is it desirable that attorneys and solicitors should be remunerated on an ad valorem scale?" which was opened by Mr. Widdows in the negative; and the society eventually decided the question in the negative by a majority of nine to two. Six gentlemen were elected members of the society, and the number of members present was thirty-four.

THE IMPERIAL CLUB.—Under the above-named designation, a new club has started into life, and has found a place of habitation in the handsome pile of building stretching along the northern side of Curator-street from Chancery-lane. The objects of the club is to provide accommodation in the way of coffee and dining, reading, lunching, and billiard rooms, for members of the legal profession, and other professional men, bankers, and merchants. The provisional committee includes nearly twenty members, and about 120 gentlemen have already enrolled their names as club members. The inaugural entertainment was held on Tuesday evening in the large room of the institution, when about fifty guests assembled and partook of a recherche dinner. Mr. Francis Webb took the chair. Mr. J. Napier Higgins proposed the club, coupled with the name of Mr. Frederick Chiffertel, who responded on its behalf.

LANCASHIRE WINTER ASSIZES, 1869.

The commissions for holding these assizes will be opened at Manchester, on Saturday, the 4th of December, and at Liverpool, on Wednesday, the 15th of December.

By an order made by the judges at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1868, "for facilitating the entry of causes for trial at future assizes for the southern division of this county, and for the more convenient arrangement of the business of such assizes." (See Sol. Jour. vol. xiii. p. 62.)

In pursuance of the above order, causes for trial at Manchester and Liverpool can be entered provisionally at the office of the Prothonotary of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster at Preston, as follows:—viz., Causes for trial at Manchester, on Monday, the 29th of November, and daily thereafter, until Thursday, the 2nd of December, inclusive, between the hours of ten o'clock in the forenoon and four o'clock in the afternoon; and causes for trial at Liverpool, on Thursday, the 9th of December, and daily thereafter until Monday, the 13th of December, inclusive, between the above mentioned hours.

The entry of causes at Manchester will commence at the Assize Courts, Manchester, immediately after the opening of the commissions, and at nine o'clock that evening will be adjourned until noon of the Tuesday following, from which hour it will be open until three o'clock the same afternoon, when it will close.

The Court will sit at Manchester for the trial of causes on Wednesday, the 8th of December, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and not sooner.

The entry of causes at Liverpool will commence at St. George's Hall, Liverpool, immediately after the opening of the commissions, and will close at nine o'clock in the evening on the commission day.

The Court will sit at eleven o'clock in the forenoon at Liverpool on the day next following the commission day.

The trial of special jury causes will commence at Manchester, at ten o'clock a.m., on Friday, the 10th of December, and at Liverpool at ten o'clock a.m., on Monday, the 20th of December, and not earlier, unless the court shall otherwise order.

A list of causes for trial at Manchester and Liverpool respectively, each day (except the first), will be exhibited in the corridor of the court and in the library.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

All the markets have been more or less inactive this week, and very little business has been done. Foreign securities have been particularly dull. Railways, however, show a tendency to a return of activity, and Consols have improved during today. The tenders for the new Metropolitan 3½ per cent. loan, recently invited, did not come up to the anticipated amount. It is rumoured that the Government do not, for the present, at any rate, intend raising in the market the amount required for the purchase of the telegraphs.

The late Mr. John Shoard, LL.D., solicitor, besides the academical honours received by him during his distinguished career at the London University (ante p. 59), was awarded the "King's Medal," by resolution of the Senate, on the 17th of February, 1864.

THE MANX LAWS.—The grossly defective state of the Manx criminal code has just led to a miscarriage of justice. The woman who was accused of having tried to murder her husband, by slowly poisoning him at Port Erin, was put on trial on Thursday; but, although the evidence against her was almost overwhelming, the prosecution had to be withdrawn, as there is no provision under the Manx criminal code for the punishment of a person charged with attempting to murder by poison. —Daily Paper.

LONDON, DECEMBER 4, 1869.

THE CURRENT NUMBER of the Weekly Reporter contains a report of Vice-Chancellor James's late decision in the case of the Family Endowment Society, one of the many companies absorbed by the Albert. In this case an annuitant of the Family Endowment Society, who had been receiving payment of his annuity from the Albert ever since the amalgamation in 1861, petitioned as a creditor of the Family Endowment Society to wind up the latter company. It was thus necessary for the Vice-Chancellor to decide, in limine, the question whether or no the annuitant should be taken as having adopted the substituted liability of the Albert, because if he were held to have done so he would be no creditor of the Family Endowment, and would have no locus standi to wind it up. The Vice-Chancellor said that the annuitant had done no more than simply present himself to receive his money and give a receipt, and that did not amount to any adoption of the Albert Company in place of the other, or any recognition of any substituted contract, with or by the Albert. The case of an annuitant is not so strong as that of a policyholder, for the obvious reason that the receipt of money is less evidence of recognition as against the recipient than payment is as against the payer. A man is glad to receive his money from anyone who comes forward to pay him, and is not likely to spend much pains in questioning the status of anyone who offers to do so. But we apprehend from the tone of Vice-Chancellor James's remarks that he would not incline to consider the payment of premiums as much evidence of adoption. It is stated that the decision is to be appealed. The question as between the policyholders and their original companies is an important one, not only to such policyholders, but also to the original policyholders in the Albert. It is, of course, the interest of the latter that as many as possible of the others should be shifted on to the other societies.

Our own view as regards this question has been that in the majority of cases the policyholders should be considered as having adopted the substituted liability of the new company, and we believe that if their notions on the subject could have been taken twelve months ago by some competent clairvoyant, it would be found that almost all of them looked to the new company as the responsible party and were forgetting all about their original societies. And yet it is quite possible that after the new company has failed many of them may honestly persuade themselves that their intentions were quite the other way. Vice-Chancellor James, however, would probably hold that in general no sufficient evidence of an adoption had been adduced.

Some assurance companies have inserted in their deeds of settlement a clause providing for a transfer of the business to some other society upon a dissolution, and it has been held repeatedly that those who insure with a society must be taken as having notice of the terms of its deed of settlement. If, therefore, any of the societies absorbed by the Albert had such a proviso in their deeds of settlement, it would appear that it would be fatal to any claims now made upon them by their original policyholders. At least to that effect is the decision of Lord Romilly in the case of the Waterloo Life, &c., Assurance Company, 33 Beav. 542. In that case the business of the Waterloo Company was transferred to the British Nation and the former company wound up, and Lord Romilly refused to allow policyholders of the Waterloo to prove under the winding up.

THE TIPPERARY ELECTION still continues to occupy a large space in public attention, and all sorts of contradictory theories have been promulgated during the last week as to the status of a convicted felon, and the possibility of his being "duly" elected a member of the House of Commons. "It is not clear," we were told in the Dublin correspondence of the Times of Thursday, "that Rossa is disqualified by his conviction, inasmuch as there was no attainder against him." There is no doubt a great difference between attainder and conviction; but, at the same time, there is no reason why conviction for a felony should not alone effectually disqualify a man from exercising the serious public duties of a member of the Legislature. "It is the law of Parliament," said Lord John Russell, in his speech on the case of Smith O'Brien (Hansard, vol. 105, p. 670), "that a person guilty of high treason or felony is incapable of sitting in this House." And this statement, we believe, will prove to be substantially accurate. Smith O'Brien, it is true, was convicted of high treason under the statute of Edw. 3, and, therefore, the judgment of death pronounced upon him involved an attainder. But the House does not seem to have considered that circumstance material, for a suggestion by Sir F. Thesiger (the present Lord Chelmsford) that a resolution should be passed declaring that Smith O'Brien had been "attainted" as well as "convicted" of high treason, was not adopted, and eventually it was simply declared that "it appears that Smith O'Brien has been adjudged guilty of high treason." It must be admitted, however, that there is a distinction between the cases of O'Brien and Rossa. A man "adjudged guilty" of high treason, or a capital felony, is, it may be contended, thereby attainted; whilst a man guilty of a felony, not punishable with death, is not. In Lord Coke's time all felonies were (apart from "benefit of clergy") capital, and therefore involved the attainder of the criminal and the forfeiture of his lands and goods. He was, in fact, "civilliter mortuus," incapable of performing any of the duties or of enjoying any of the rights of a citizen. A convicted felon and an attainted felon, were, therefore, practically synonymous. This is no longer so, inasmuch as few felonies are now punishable with death, and none, except treason and murder, are accompanied by absolute forfeiture of lands (see 54 Geo. 3, c. 145). But a "felon" is a felon still, though relieved of the old common law penalty on his offence, and as such is under many civil disabilities. Thus, in Roberts v. Walker (1 Russ. & M. 752), it was held that whilst the sentence of a felon, against whom judgment of death had not been recorded, was running out, he could not make a title to goods of any description, and, again, it was laid down in R. v. Burridge (3 P. Wms. 439) that one convicted (not attainted) of felony within benefit of clergy—i.e., one on whom judgment of death did not pass, remained a "felon" until the sentence passed on him had expired.

Although, therefore, Rossa has only been convicted and not attainted of felony, under the Treason-Felony Act (11 Vict. c. 12), we believe the election judge will hold him disqualified from being elected a member of Parliament. But whether this be so or not is really unimportant, for if any doubt should exist on the subject, the House of Commons will be able to remove the difficulty by a resolution expelling the convict as unfit to perform, as, indeed, whilst under sentence he is physically incapable of performing the duties of a legislator. Such a resolution will, we presume, be immediately passed in the not very probable event of the somewhat technical distinction between a convicted and an attainted felon being held to be substantial.

THE ADDITION OF THREE to the number of the common law judges was, in our opinion, a useful measure, and the experience of the last week certainly shows that, even leaving entirely out of consideration the special and heavy, but intermittent, work arising out of election petitions, there is at certain times of the year more than enough work for the present staff. It is in the ten days or so next after the expiration of term, that the want of judges is especially felt. The sittings in Error then take place, and less than six judges certainly cannot be considered to form a sufficient court for reversing the decisions of four other judges of equal, or it may chance to be, of superior judicial reputation. At the same time come the only Nisi Prius sittings, at which Middlesex special jury cases are tried, and the state of the lists is generally such as to make it desirable to have two judges sitting at Nisi Prius for each court. The Exchequer frequently get through their list with only one judge sitting for the greater part of the time, especially if the one judge happens to be Baron Martin, but then, as against this, the Queen's Bench would scarcely get through their Nisi Prius list, even with three judges sitting. Then, again, it seldom happens that the Crown, Special, and New Trial Papers, are so cleared off in term, that it can be considered satisfactory to leave them as they are until the next term, and to have no sittings in Banco between the terms. About this time of year also come the winter circuits, which take six judges from town. We believe it has been usual for them to delay their departure until after the conclusion of the sittings of Exchequer Chamber. This year, however, some of them have started earlier; we do not know whether in consequence of heavier business at the Assizes, or because they imagined that owing to the increased number of judges, their presence in London would not be required. The consequence, however, is that none of the courts have been able to hold post-terminal sittings for more than a few hours, and the sittings of the Exchequer Chamber have been so short and unsatisfactory that they have utterly failed to dispose of the lists of cases in Error. There were twelve cases set down in Error from the Queen's Bench, of which four only have been heard. In Error from the Common Pleas there was an important case, which had been argued at previous sittings, but in which judgment ought to have been given. It was, however, impossible even to collect the opinions of the judges who had heard the case, so that judgment might be given. There were here only three cases set down for argument, and of these two were heard and one part heard. The Court, however, which sat was scarcely a satisfactory one, consisting of the four judges of the Exchequer, who have habitually sat in Banco during the past term, with the assistance of Mr. Justice Mellor to represent the Queen's Bench. If this Court had happened to reverse by a majority only, or even unanimously, a unanimous judgment of four judges in the Common Pleas, no one could have thought the result satisfactory. We believe, however, that the judgment of the Court below is only likely to be reversed in one case, and that was a judgment of two judges only. In error from the Exchequer, there was, besides an important revenue case, a list of seven other cases. No Court at all could be formed to hear these cases, and so they all stand over till February. All this time, of course, sittings, at Nisi Prius have been held, but with every prospect of many remanets being left at the end of the sittings, at all events, in the Queen's Bench and Common Pleas. Of course, much of the inconvenience is due to present deficiency of judges in the Queen's Bench, and that, we hope we may say, is temporary only. The lamented death of Mr. Justice Hayes causes one vacancy, which, notwithstanding the conduct of the Government in not filling up vacancies in other judicial offices, must, we think, be merely temporary. Whatever could be said in favour of having only seventeen judges instead of eighteen, a question we need not now discuss at length, it would be simply absurd that the Queen's Bench, with by far the most work, should have one less judge than the other courts. Nor would the absurdity be the less if the somewhat eccentric suggestion of the Times were carried out, and Mr. Commissioner Bacon were appointed to the vacant office, continuing to perform the duties of Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, and not those of a judge of the Queen's Bench; a course which, inasmuch as it would be a deserved promotion of Mr. Bacon to an honourable and dignified position, would be satisfactory to every member of the profession, though its probable effect on the business of the court would be thought quite the reverse of satisfactory. Then, again, not only has the Queen's Bench been deprived of one judge by death, but Mr. Justice Hannen has been temporarily absent, owing to a sad domestic affliction, and Mr. Justice Lush was the first of all the judges by several days in starting for the winter circuit. The mischief to suitors, therefore, has been caused partly by the absolute insufficiency of the number of available judges for the work requiring to be done at the same time, but more by the deficiency happening in one court; and the conclusion is that while great advantages might accrue to suitors from the late increase in the number of judges, and in the maintenance of that increased number, yet without further powers of arranging the work much of the advantage is lost. Although a Court could not be found for hearing Errors from the Exchequer, yet as the judges of the Exchequer were comparatively disengaged, there would have been no difficulty in continuing the sittings in Error from the Queen's Bench for, say, three days longer, in which time some real way would have been made with the list. Of course, however, this could not be done, as three days only had been appointed. We have frequently advocated a power of transfer of cases from one court to another, which also would tend to prevent the delays, which now occur. It is true we are promised something very comprehensive as the result of the Judicature Commission, but from all we can see we shall not get it much before the New Law Courts. When so simple an expedient would give real temporary relief, there is no reason why we should not have it at once.

It must be remembered that the block upon which we have been commenting happened at a time when the amount of original or new business in the common law courts is smaller than it has been for years. This result itself is probably due in great measure to the difficulties which suitors have hitherto met in getting their cases disposed of, though no doubt other causes contribute to the result. Whether the decrease of litigation be thought by the public in general to be a benefit to the nation or not, at all events it cannot be a benefit that litigation should decrease owing to the incapacity of the national tribunals to satisfy intending litigants.

A CASE OF Begbie v. Fenwick, before Lord Justice Giffard yesterday, elicited the existence of a practice in one, at least, of the Vice-Chancellor's Chambers, which his Lordship thought should at once be varied. It appeared that a "note" had been made in the chief clerk's book, which had been held to be binding on the parties by the Vice-Chancellor; and proceedings occupying many days had taken place thereon, notwithstanding the protest of one of the parties that the note did not correctly represent an agreement come to. His Lordship decided that the chief clerk's note was not binding as an agreement, it not having been signed by the parties, and expressed his strong desire that, in future, whenever it was intended that parties should be absolutely bound by a "note" of the chief clerk, so as to be precluded from taking exception to it, each of the chief clerks should take the precaution of having it signed by the parties whom it was sought to bind. It is for the benefit of the legal profession generally that his Lordship's desire should, at the earliest moment, be made known, in order that similar inconvenience to that which has arisen in the case under notice may be avoided in the future.

IN A NEWSPAPER ACCOUNT of the late half-yearly meeting of the Incorporated Society of Solicitors and Attorneys of Ireland the report of the society is stated to contain a passage in which the members are informed that the council had abandoned the movement for the abolition of the certificate duty, owing to the adverse opinion of the English solicitors and attorneys. If this means that the English solicitors and attorneys have ceased to desire the abolition of that vexatious impost, or determined to abandon all hope of its repeal, the assertion is founded in a mistake.

THE FAMINE OF JUDGES.

"My son," said the great Chancellor of Sweden, "it is marvellous with how little wisdom the world is governed." If the speaker had lived in these days and this country, he would not have failed to deduce an apt illustration of his famous maxim from the present action of our leading journal upon what may fitly be denominated "the judicial question." We have not seldom found it our duty to call public attention to the reckless ignorance displayed by the Times in writing upon legal matters, and the latest effusion of this kind is not less remarkable than any of its predecessors. In commenting upon the lamented death of Mr. Justice Hayes, the *Times gives to light a project not perhaps so absurd in itself as in the reasoning by which it is attempted to be supported. This notable scheme is shortly this—that, inasmuch as by the new Bankruptcy Act the future Chief Judges in Bankruptcy are to be selected from the ranks of the Bench, at common law or in equity, (the Times, with careful inaccuracy, says he is to be "a common law judge,") and, as there is now a vacancy in the Court of Queen's Bench, it would be desirable to adopt the converse rule, and promote to that vacancy the present Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. The only thing which this project has to recommend it is that it would secure a proper recognition of Mr. Bacon's undoubted merits both in the matter of status and of salary, but, as the Lord Chancellor promised in the House of Lords, as explicitly as any Cabinet Minister can be reasonably expected to promise anything, that this should be done at any rate, under the discretionary powers vested in the Government by the Act, it is perhaps not a sufficient ground for perpetuating the present crippled condition of the Common Law Bench.

But when we come to consider the grounds upon which this notable scheme is advocated, we are fairly astounded at the ignorance or audacity, or both, which the writer displays. In the first place, it is coolly assumed, as the groundwork of the whole case, that the late increase of the Common Law Bench was necessitated simply and solely by the Bribery Act, and that when, as now, election petitions are few or none the old fifteen judges would be amply sufficient for the requirements of the courts. The facts are, as must be well known to everyone of our readers, that for years there has been an ever-increasing demand for more judges, not only from the courts themselves, but from every law association and chamber of commerce in the kingdom, and that the extra duty thrown upon the judges by the Act in question only determined the time and form at and in which the inevitable increase took place. For years the columns of this journal have been occupied from time to time with the discussion of schemes of various kinds and from various sources for the redistribution of business so as to reduce the admitted want of judicial power to a minimum, but none of such schemes seemed to find any favour either with the profession or the country, and the cry for more judges was reiterated year by year with greater vehemence, at almost every meeting of any of the great legal or commercial bodies either in London or in the provinces. It is, therefore, a manifest absurdity to say that there is anything in the fact that a particular opportunity was taken advantage of to combine with the necessary increase of judicial force an extension—by no means correlative—in judicial duty, which would justify the course suggested by the Times.

That some such course as this will probably be adopted there is but too much reason to fear. We can hardly expect that those who can see and hear unmoved the frightful delays and indignant complaints caused by the present state of the Bench in Scotland and Ireland will be restrained from inflicting a similar, but greatly lesser, injury on the course of public business in England. True, the continuance of the present vacancy has, on at least one occasion, already prevented the Court of Queen's from sitting in Banco, and has been productive of the worst possible evil—weakness in the Court of Appeal; but those who can persuade themselves that the Court of Appeal in Chancery is now in a satisfactory state will hardly be persuaded—albeit by the unanimous consent of the judges themselves—that the Court of Exchequer Chamber is not sufficiently represented on an appeal from the Common Pleas by three Barons of the Exchequer.

But the part of the article in question which we contemplate with the greatest dread is the passage in which the example of the Court of Chancery is invoked in support of the scheme. Here it is:—

Experience has shown that the business of the courts can be transacted with a single judge in all cases except Appeals from the Chancery Court of Lancaster, and it cannot be pretended that these appeals are of such transcendent importance as to require special treatment. If a single Lord Justice is competent to review an order of the Master of the Rolls, or of any one of the three Vice-Chancellors at Lincoln's Inn, he must be sufficiently qualified to review the decisions of the excellent and learned Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy. The question was, in fact, settled when the Act was passed, two years since, enabling each Lord Justice to sit alone. That statute was, to some extent, experimental; but it was found to work admirably, the only fault discoverable in it being that the powers of the Lords Justices when sitting alone were needlessly restricted. The separation of the Judges was, of course, equivalent to the establishment of another Appeal Court, and it was natural that men should ask whether this increase of tribunals was necessary. It is evident from the experience of this Term that it is not required, when the Lord Chancellor is so far free from his duties in the House of Lords as to be able to attend regularly at Lincoln's Inn, and the statistics of other years show that one court can in general despatch all the business of Appeal in Chancery even in the midst of the Parliamentary Session. It is an inevitable consequence of these facts that the Government should be disposed to recommend to the Legislature such a re-arrangement of the work of Chancery Appeal as to dispense with the existence of a second Lord Justice.

It is not too much to say that every sentence of this passage, except the last, contains at least one mis-statement either of fact or inference. Experience has not shown that the business of the Court of Appeal can be transacted with a single judge except in the cases there mentioned; and the Act passed to meet a particular contingency, and enable Lord Cairns to sit alone during Sir George Turner's illness, has not been found by any means satisfactory. So far is it from the truth that it was found "to work admirably," and only to be faulty on the score of needless restriction, that when the Lords Justices so interpreted the statute as to enable them to sit separately upon appeals from motions for decree, an Act was passed in the next session of Parliament to restrict their power still further and confine their separate action to strictly interlocutory and summary business. So far were these judges themselves from considering this extension of their power as beneficial, that from the moment the labours of Lord Cairns and Lord Justice Rolt had overcome the long roll of arrears caused by Lord Justice Turner's protracted illness, the Act was suffered to fall entirely into disuse, until Lord Justice Selwyn's unfortunate incapacity to sit reproduced the emergency, and with it the exceptional, and as we hoped, temporary remedy. We are now informed, however, on authority which we are reluctantly compelled to believe, that a bill for the extinction of the second Lord Justiceship, and the perpetuation of the essentially vicious system of appeal to a single judge, will be introduced as soon as Parliament meets. We can only hope that, as this is a matter of public efficiency, not of party politics, the Legislature may have sufficient public spirit to refuse to sanction it.

It is instructive to notice, however, that the plan thus announced is essentially different from that put forward during the Vacation, and combated in this journal about a month since. The plan then suggested was, to diminish by one the Judges of First Instance, leaving the Court of Appeal unimpaired; but as that seems to have excited too formidable an opposition, it is quietly dropped, and (as the £6,000 a-year must be saved coute qui coute) the Court of Appeal is to be sacrificed as a victim to our present cheese-paring divinity.

And this error is, if possible, worse than the former: that would at most have caused a long arrear of business, and have wearied the suitors and impoverished the country by intolerable delays; but this impairs the efficiency of the court itself, and tends to bring the administration of justice into deserved contempt. The first requisite of a good Court of Appeal is that it should be strong: strong, that is, comparatively to the court appealed from: so that not only the unsuccessful litigants, but the judges below themselves, should be satisfied with the tribunal, and disposed to bow to its dictates. This can never be the case when the Appeal Court consists of a single judge, unless there be some inherent difference, not only in the status of the Courts themselves, but in the previous positions of the men from whom the judges are drawn. An appeal from a county court to a single judge is theoretically defensible (though we doubt whether even this is practically advisable), because the county court judge is not only in an inferior position, but has been drawn from a lower stratum in the ranks of the profession; but no such difference exists between a Lord Justice and a Vice-Chancellor, and the system of appeal from one alone to the other alone, essentially vicious as it is, must break down whenever, as may at any time be the case, the Court of Appeal is filled by a judge not notoriously superior to the judges appealed from.

In one observation we agree with the Times, experience has shown that one Court of Appeal sitting uninterruptedly is ordinarily enough for the appeal business of the Court. By all means, then, let us in all ordinary cases have but one such Court, but let that be done, not by diminishing but by increasing its efficiency, not by requiring a single Lord Justice to pit his opinion against that of a judge who, it may be, adorned the bench when he, who now reviews his decisions, was still outside the bar, but by carrying out in its integrity the admitted intention of the framers of the Act under which the Lords Justices were appointed, and formally depriving the Lord Chancellor of that power of sitting alone, on appeals, which the Act formally reserves to him, but of which he was never expected habitually to avail himself. We remember to have heard a distinguished advocate of that time, afterwards himself an ornament of the Bench, characterise Lord Cottenham's adoption of the practice of sitting alone (an example since followed by all his successors in office), as "one of the wickedest things that old man ever did."

ON SIGNING THE MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

The situation of a person who has signed the memorandum of association of a limited company for a given number of shares differs in some respects from that of a person who has merely applied for shares, and has had them allotted to him. In the latter case communication of the fact of the allotment, coupled with the entry of the name on the share register is needed to establish the binding contract to take the shares; which in the former case is established by the simple act of signing the memorandum of association. Until all these requirements have been complied with there is a locus penitentiae for the applicant, enabling him in many cases to back out and escape liability; and unless the same requirements have been complied with by him, a motion on his behalf to rectify the register by the omission of his name, or a summons to have his name removed from the list of contributories, according as the company may be or may not be in course of liquidation, will, in many cases, prove successful. But where a person has subscribed the memorandum of association the case is different. Such a person is in the same situation as one who had executed the deed of settlement under the old law. The mere act of signing the memorandum imports an agreement on the subscriber's part enforceable in equity to take the number of shares set opposite the name of the subscriber (Companies Act, 1862, s. 23), and makes him to that extent a member. The single act of signing the memorandum, therefore, puts the person signing it in exactly the same situation as regards the company, as the person who has applied for shares, has had them allotted to him, has had the fact of the allotment communicated to him, and has had his name entered on the register. The person who has signed the memorandum may never have had the shares allotted to him, and his name may not appear on the register; but so long as there are left unallotted shares to answer his demand, his liability to take such shares continues, and he will be placed on the list of contributories in respect of them. In Evans' case (15 W. R. 243, L. R. 2 Ch. 427), Mr. Evans, it is true, was a director at one time, and ought, as such, to have seen that his own name was entered on the register; but even if he had not been a director we apprehend that on the general principle his liability to take the shares would still have remained, subject to there being shares in existence which could be allotted to him.

In Snell's case (18 W. R. 30), where the truth of the principle in Evans' case was acknowledged, there was a specific power in the articles of association for the directors to accept surrenders of shares on such terms as they might think fit. This power, in the opinion of the Lord Justice, had been properly exercised, with the removal of Mr. Snell's name as the result. We doubt how far, as a matter of public policy, such a power as this ought to be allowed to supersede the statutory effect of subscribing the memorandum, having regard to the fact that the object of the enactment was to compel persons who lent their names in order to establish a company to be really substantially liable, and not to allow them to hold out their names as the promoters, and at the same time incur no obligation (Evans' case, 15 W. R. 476). The only legitimate way for a subscriber of the memorandum to get rid of his liability ought to be by a bonâ fide transfer. We are far from impeaching the decision in Snell's case, having regard to the special grounds of that decision, but we do regret that it should be possible to introduce into the articles of association a power which shall have the effect virtually of abrogating the 23rd section of the Companies Act.

We have seen that the mere signature of the memorandum raises an obligation to take as many shares as the subscriber has signed for, whether or not the shares are allotted to him and registered in his name. That he must also pay for the shares so to be taken it is almost needless to add. He may pay for them either in meal or in malt, in money or in money's worth (Pellatt's case, 15 W. R. 726). But in one form or the other pay for them he must. His obligation to do so is not satisfied by the allotment at any subsequent period of nominally fully paid-up shares, by the direction of a third person entitled to have such shares allotted to himself in part payment for the business which the company was incorporated in order to purchase (Migotti's case, 15 W. R. 731, L. R. 4 Eq. 238). In fact, when Mr. Migotti accepted the allotment of the shares, which really belonged to a third person, he was not literally fulfilling his contract to take of the company and pay for the number of shares for which he signed. Even if the shares allotted to Mr. Migotti had not been nominally paid-up shares, the decision would, we apprehend, have been exactly the same—viz., that Mr. Migotti was liable to accept at the hands of the company, and pay for, a number of shares equal to the number signed for by him.

This principle was fully recognised in De Beville's case (17 W. R. 90, L. R. 7 Eq. 11). The Master of the Rolls in deciding that case expressed an opinion that where a person has signed in respect of shares stated on the face of the memorandum to be fully paid-up, while they are not really paid-up, he would be liable to pay on them. And this view of his Lordship has very recently been approved by the Lord Justice Giffard in Drummond's case (18 W. R. 2, L. R. 8 Eq. 772). Where, however, as in De Beville's case, the distinction is already made in the memorandum, and the subscriber signs, for example, in respect of 100 shares generally, and in respect of 100 fully paid-up shares, then though he is a contributory in respect of the first 100 he is not a contributory in respect of the 100 paid-up shares. The 100 for which he has subscribed without qualification are enough to satisfy the statute; and the Court will not go behind that, and inquire whether he gave any consideration for the 100 shares expressed to be fully paid-up.

Cases are of frequent occurrence where so many paid-up shares are to be paid pursuant to the articles of association for the business of an individual transferred to the company. Where this is the case, and the individual subscribes the memorandum for a certain number of shares, nothing being there stated as to these shares being treated as paid-up, the question arises whether he can be placed on the list of contributories in respect of them. Pell's case (18 W. R. 31), supplies the answer to the question. Mr. Pell signed for 1,350 shares, which, of course, he was primâ facie bound to take and pay for, and he was also entitled to 1,500 fully paid-up shares, under an agreement comprised by the articles, the validity of which was not impeached; what the Lord Justice did was to assume that the 1,350 shares subscribed for were part of the 1,500 fully paid-up shares agreed to be taken, although there was nothing to identify the shares signed for by Mr. Pell with the shares to which he was entitled in pursuance of the agreement, as there was in Drummond's case (18 W. R. 2, L. R. 4 Ch. 772). In that case a new company had been formed, and every shareholder in the old company was entitled under the articles of the new company to a proportionate number of paid-up shares in the new company. Mr. Drummond, as one of these, signed the memorandum of the new company for twenty-five shares simpliciter, and afterwards had a larger number of fully paid-up shares allotted to him pursuant to the foregoing arrangement. On an application to fix him on the list of contributories, the Lord Justice held—we will not say reversing the Master of the Rolls, inasmuch as his Lordship appears not to have had the facts properly before him—that the obligation to take the twenty-five shares was satisfied by the allotment of a greater number of shares as fully paid, for which Mr. Drummond had in effect paid money's worth by the transfer to the new company of his interest in the assets of the old company.

In Drummond's case there was this additional circumstance—that there were no unpaid shares available for allotment to Mr. Drummond at the time when the allotment ought to have been made; but, even if there had been, the shares actually allotted were allotted as paid-up, in consideration for the applicant's share in the business of the old company. This case, therefore, does not in any way impeach the general rule to which we have before adverted—viz., that a man who signs the memorandum of association agrees to take and pay for the shares set down opposite his name, and so long as there are shares that can be allotted to him, he must fulfil that obligation.

Snell's case (ubi sup.) only shows that it will continue to be possible for a statutory provision, founded upon obvious principles of public policy, to be evaded by the help of a clause in the articles of association, so long as the promoters of companies are allowed to frame their articles of association without supervision. Every other case to which we have referred, and we believe we have referred to most, only tends to establish the truth of the foregoing principle, the existence of which cannot be too generally recognised.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

TRUSTEES' RECEIPT—NOTICE THAT EXECUTORS HAVE ASSUMED THE FUNCTION OF TRUSTEES.

Charlton v. Earl of Durham, L.C., 17 W. R. 995.

When a trustee has received moneys subject to the trust and misappropriated them, the loss occasioned by the breach of trust must, in the usual event of nothing being recoverable from the trustee, fall upon one of two persons, for the most part equally innocent—viz., the cestui que trust or the person who paid the money. It is in such cases, therefore, that questions arise as to the validity and sufficiency of trustees' or executors' receipts as discharges to the paying persons. With respect to the liability of the persons paying to see to the application of the money, the law on this point is much simplified by Lord St. Leonard's Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 23), 1859, and Lord Cranworth's Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, s. 29), 1860, which, as to trusts created by instruments subsequent to those Acts, render the receipt a complete discharge to the payer, without its being necessary for him to see to the application of the money, unless the instrument declares the contrary. As to older trusts, the old law is still in force, and many years, of course, must elapse before it disappears. The primary rule is, that a person who has in his hands money to which another is entitled is not discharged, except by paying it to the true owner, and, in cases of trust, the cestui que trust are the true owners. In the application, however, of this rule the exceptions are as numerous as the instances, since wherever the contrary is expressed or implied the rule does not hold. It was never clearly ascertained in what cases a power to trustees to give receipts is implied. It is implied where there is a trust for immediate sale, or where the proceeds of sale are not to be paid over to specified parties, but become subject to a special trust (as in the case of most settlements), or where there is a trust to pay debts or legacies (Stroughill v. Austey, 1 De G. M. & G. 650). The case of a charge, as distinguished from a devise in trust for payment of debts, is deemed by Mr. Lewin (Lewin on Trusts, 340, and see 332, et seq.) important and intricate enough for special examination.

A trust cannot be delegated, and therefore, where there is a trust, the trustees' receipt alone can discharge a party owing money, though it seems that trustees may appoint an agent, their solicitor for instance, to receive the money, and in Robertson v. Armstrong (28 Beav. 126), where trustees had authorised their solicitor to receive purchase-money for them and the purchaser paid him, receiving a receipt written by the trustees, the purchaser was exonerated from liability for an error of the solicitor, who allowed the money to get lost by permitting it to come into the hands of a tenant for life who was not entitled to the corpus.

Moreover, as trusteeship is a joint office, the receipt of one trustee is not sufficient to discharge the paying person, the receipt of all is necessary. In this respect trustees differ from executors. The receipt of one of several executors is a complete discharge (see Jacomb v. Harwood, 2 Ves. Sen. 265). But where more than one person is administering an estate, the administrators must be joined in every act, and a receipt by one of two administrators would not be a discharge; for which reason the Court of Probate is reluctant to grant a joint administration.

Under most wills the same individuals are executors as well as trustees, and as soon as the debts have been paid, all executorial acts, in short, completed, they cease to be executors and become trustees. After that time any person dealing with them on the footing of trustees must in his own interest take the receipt of all, and not merely of one, as he might have done if dealing with them previously on the footing of executors. That is on the supposition that the payee has notice that the executorship is at an end. But (and this is the principle in which the principal case turns) the courts will not infer such notice from twenty or thirty years' lapse of time. It has in many cases been argued that the Court would say,—after so long a time there was a very strong probability that all the debts must have been paid, and the lapse of time was enough to put the party on inquiry; but the contrary has been held (See Sabin v. Heape, 8 W. R. 120, 27 Beav. 553, and Wrigley v. Sykes, 4 W. R. 228, 21 Beav. 337).

In the principal case the testator had held a bond given by the defendant's trustees. Testator died and was represented by his executors. Defendant on coming of age substituted his own bond, dealing with the executors as executors. Afterwards one of the executors called in the money, which was paid to him by the defendant, and the recipient endorsed on the bond his own receipt and a forged signature of his co-executor, and embezzled the money. This was in 1862; the will had been proved in 1849 and in point of fact, the debts having been long since paid, the executors had long since become trustees. On a bill filed by the co-executor and the beneficiaries, Lord Hatherley, affirming Vice-Chancellor James, held that the defendant could not be treated as having notice that the executors had become trustees; consequently, having the receipt of one trustee he was discharged from his liability.

SETTLEMENT BY SETTLOR ON HIMSELF UNTIL BANKRUPTCY.

Hammond v. Barrett, V.C.S., 17 W. R. 1078.

It is well known that a limitation to the husband, if he survive the wife, of an interest determinable on bankruptcy or alienation, cannot in general be attached to the husband's own property, though good as regards the wife's fortune and any property brought into settlement by any other person than the husband (Davidson's Precedents and Forms of Conveyancing, vol. 3, p. 85). This case is an instance of the rule being departed from for adequate reasons. The settled fund comprised a large fund provided by the wife's brother, and a comparatively small sum provided by the husband, and was settled, after the wife's death, on the husband for life, or until bankruptcy or alienation. Under ordinary circumstances the limitation by the settlor to himself of a defeasible interest of this description is regarded as a fraud upon creditors, and therefore void as against the assignee in bankruptcy. But in this case the fund which came from the wife's brother was much the larger of the two, and was a consideration for a stipulation which accompanied the gift, namely, that the entire fund should be settled as already mentioned. We do not remember a similar case to Hammond v. Barrett. The cases where the reservation of a beneficial interest by the husband defeasible upon alienation or bankruptcy have been held void, such as Phiops v. Lord Ennismore (4 Russ. 131), Higinbotham v. Holme (19 Ves. 88), and Holmes v. Penney (5 W. R. 132), are all cases where the reservation was solely for the settlor's benefit, and was not purchased by another as in the present instance. The last-mentioned case, however, decides that a man may settle his own property so as to give trustees a discretion to divide it between himself and his wife and children in the event of his bankruptcy, with exclusive power of selection—a decision which, at all events, shows a way by which the operation of this rule may be practically evaded.

COMMON LAW.

CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE—LEGALITY OF STRIKES—FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

Farrer v. Close, Q.B., 17 W. R. 1129.

The practical importance of this case is much diminished by the provisions of the Act of last session, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 61, for the protection of the funds of trade unions. The judgments, however, deal with questions beyond the scope of that statute, and for this reason, as well as because the statute is only to remain in force until the end of 1879, the case deserves attention.

The point for decision arose under sections 24 and 44 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63 (the Friendly Societies Act, 1855). That statute contains various provisions for the management, &c., of friendly societies, and under sections 24 and 44 proceedings may be taken before justices against persons misappropriating the funds of a friendly society, if such society is established for any of certain specified purposes, "or for any purpose that is not illegal." Proceedings were taken before justices against the respondent for misappropriating money of a friendly society, of which the appellant was treasurer. The justices were of opinion that the respondent had misappropriated the money; but they dismissed the charge on the ground that the society was for an illegal purpose, as they thought that the rules of the society, and evidence of its working, showed that it operated in restraint of trade, by protecting and encouraging strikes. The rules were somewhat ambiguous in their wording, and were capable of being applied to purposes only which were within the scope of friendly societies. It was, however, shown by evidence that under these rules the society had in fact given, or was prepared to give, money to support men during strikes, or to prevent their returning to work. It was not shown that any illegal strikes had been supported, or that any illegal means had been used by the society to support any strikes, unless it is the law that all strikes are necessarily illegal.

It seems that there are only two reported cases which have any important bearing on this question: Hilton v. Eckersly (6 E. & B. 47), and Hornby v. Close (15 W. R. 336). The facts of those cases, however, differ much from the facts in Farrer v. Close.

The Court were equally divided and so the decision of the justices was upheld. The judgment of Cockburn, C.J., with which Mellor, J., concurred, relies on the fact that strikes were in fact supported by the society, and seems to assume, though it is not so stated directly, that all strikes are illegal. This view of the law is expressed to be based upon the principle of Hornby v. Close and Hilton v. Eckersly. Hannen, J., thought that the decision of the justices was wrong, because strikes are not necessarily illegal, and, therefore, supporting men on strike is not necessarily illegal. Hayes, J., also was of opinion that the justices were wrong, but he bases his judgment chiefly on the vagueness of the evidence. He seems to think that if the evidence had been clear as to the giving of money to men on strike to prevent their returning to work he would have agreed with Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor, J.

The precise question in Farrer v. Close cannot arise again while 32 & 33 Vict. c. 61 remains in force, for that statute provides that "an association of persons having rules, agreements, or practices among themselves as to the terms on which they or any of them will or will not consent to employ or to be employed, shall not by reason only that any of such rules, agreements, or practices may operate in restraint of trade," be deemed illegal within section 24 of the Friendly Societies Act.

It will be seen that the scope of this Act is much restricted. It is temporary, and it only applies to a particular section of the Friendly Societies Act. It makes no general alteration in the law. The principles discussed in Furrer v. Close are therefore still unsettled, and it seems yet doubtful whether strikes are or are not necessarily illegal.

The following passages from the judgments of Hannen and Hayes J.J. respectively, have more than a merely legal interest:—"I can see that the maintenance of strikes may be against the interest of employers, because they may be thereby forced to yield at their own expense a larger share of profits or other advantages to the employee; but I have no means of judicially determining that this is contrary to the interests of the whole community, and I think that in deciding that it is, and that therefore any act done in its furtherance is illegal, we should be basing our judgment, not on recognised legal principles, but on the opinions of one of the contending schools of political economists;" and Hayes J. says "no doubt the trade of an employer is restrained when workmen decline to take the wages which he is willing to give; but it must be remembered that the men are traders as well as the employer, and it would be an odd way of promoting freedom of trade to hold it an illegal pressure on their part, to endeavour, out of their own savings, to put themselves in a better position, to get what they think a fair price for their labour."

REVIEWS.

The Law of Railways: embracing Corporations, Eminent Domain, Contracts, Common Carriers of Goods and Passengers, Telegraph Companies, Constitutional Law, Investments, &c. &c. Fourth edition. By ISAAC F. REDFIELD, LL.D., Chief Justice of Vermont. Boston: Little, Brown, & Company. 1869.

The law of railways, although one of the most modern branches of law is of great and constantly-increasing importance. It affects more or less a large portion of the whole field of law, involving as it does considerations as to the formation of companies, the taking of land by agreement or compulsion, the status and powers of corporate bodies, the rights and duties of masters, of carriers, of owners of land, of owners of dangerous machinery, and a great many other subjects.

The law of railways has, of course, attracted the attention of text-writers in England. Our books on the subject pretend to no higher merit than that which is due to a well-arranged digest. A comparison of these with Mr. Redfield's book which is now before us, affords an excellent illustration of the difference between English and American legal literature. The chief object of the English books is to be trustworthy digests; that of the American books to be clear expositions of legal principles. A single instance will show the difference between the two methods of treating law.

The power of a railway company to take land compulsorily is treated in Hodges' and in Shelford's books on railways simply under the heading of the statute which gives the power to railway companies, the cases decided on the statute being added. In Mr. Redfield's book this question is discussed under the head of "Eminent Domain", which as he truly says, is a title little found in English books, although often used by writers on international law. It signifies the supreme right of the sovereign power of any state over all the private property within the State in cases where it is expedient that private rights of property should give way to the general good. There can be no doubt that the latter is the more scientific mode of dealing with the subject, although some might deem the former the more practical.

Mr. Redfield deals with every question that can in any sense be considered as affecting railway companies, and he treats of several branches of law in addition to those contained in Hodges and in Shelford. For instance, besides the usual subjects that directly affect railways, such as the taking of land, the formation and management of the company, &c., &c., he has chapters on the origin and different classes of corporations, on the liability of railway companies for the acts of their servants and agents, and on injuries by fellow-servants. The whole law relating to carriers of goods and passengers is examined, including the general law of bailments for carriage, the meaning of "negligence;" evidence, measure of damages, lien, injuries causing death, &c., &c. The law relating to telegraph companies is also discussed. So wide, indeed, is the scope of the book that there is a section on the measure of damages to which servants wrongfully dismissed are entitled, and another on the right of trustees to invest trust funds in railway securities.

The plan of the work is explained in the preface to the first edition to be to combine the advantages of a mere digest and of a mere treatise upon principles of law. This plan has upon the whole been well carried out over a very extensive field of inquiry, and the book contains the whole law affecting railways in the shape of a number of well-written treatises on the different subjects treated of. The endeavour, however, to combine the opposite merits of a digest and a scientific treatise on law has, we think, in some instances caused no inconsiderable evil in leading the author into a sketchy way of dealing with a subject; some cases being cited, and some principles discussed, but neither treated exhaustively. For instance, in the chapter on the nature of corporations (vol. 1, p. 50, et seq.), which commences with an allusion to the laws of Solon, there is no clear explanation of the nature of corporations. A good deal is said about them, and several definitions given; but there is no reference to the difference between a corporation and a partnership, and we doubt whether one ignorant of that difference would learn it from this chapter. So also in the section on injuries causing death (vol. 2, p. 243), there is no explanation of the principle which rendered legislation necessary on the subject—viz., that an action of tort is put an end to by death, and the difficulty where there is a right of action as to the measure of damages, nor is there a good collection of cases; while the topics of contributory negligence, and of injury to fellow-servants are touched upon in this section very unnecessarily, these subjects having been treated of before, when all the cases on these points should have been collected and explained once for all.

There are, besides these, other instances throughout the books of a want of thoroughness in its composition. As in the section on "contracts to transfer stock" (vol. 1, p. 121, n.) a statement is made as to the English law of stock-jobbing, and Sir John Barnard's Act (10 Geo. 2, c. 8), is mentioned as if it were still in force, although it was repealed in 1860. At the same place, also, there is a reference to English cases on the effect of the rules of the Stock Exchange on contracts for the transfer of shares, but the only cases cited are the comparatively old ones of Stray v. Russell (2 Ell. & Ell. 592), and Field v. Lelan, (6 H. & N. 617), no notice being taken of the more important recent cases, such as Grissell v. Bristow (17 W. R. 123), Coles v. Bristow (17 W. R. 105), and Shepherd v. Murphy (16 W. R. 948). This is the more curious, as generally the late cases have been carefully inserted.

Notwithstanding these defects this work is of real value, and is superior to the majority of English text-books. It deals with the various topics discussed in most cases with much clearness and ability, and a full comprehension of the subject under discussion is usually shown. The matter of which the book is composed is well arranged so far as arrangement is possible, and the bulk of the book which comprises about 1,400 pages in two volumes, is owing to the amount of the subject-matter, and not to any unnecessary diffuseness in its treatment. The great number and length of the notes is, however, somewhat inconvenient, as they contain not only references to cases, but also very important legal matter. It is worth consideration whether the convenience of readers would not be best consulted by incorporating in the text much that is now in the shape of disjointed notes.

Some of the remarks on railway management express with great force the author's views as to the dangers of railway travelling, on which point he appears to have very decided opinions. He says, after speaking of the care with which most Continental lines are managed, "We cannot but feel surprised that public opinion in America " (and in the note he applies this to England also) "will tolerate such terrible destruction of life, such horrid mangling of bodies and limbs, and literal burning alive as has occurred here within the last few years." We most cordially join in the hope which he expresses, that "the time is not very remote when our courts will be able to place themselves upon the proper theory on this subject, that any person natural or corporate, who undertakes the transportation of passengers by the dangerous element of steam and with the great speed of railway trains must be held responsible for the use of every precaution which any known skill or experience has yet been able to devise, and that passengers are not bound to judge for themselves how many of these precautions it is safe to forego."

We notice that the first 305 pages (with the exception of one section of four pages) of the second volume on the Law of Railways are printed verbatim in the same author's Law of Carriers, and constitute rather more than half of the latter work. The fact that so much of the Law of Carriers is a mere reprint is not noticed. This is not fair to the purchasers of the later books, who may fairly complain when they ascertain that only half of the Law of Carriers is new matter.

COURTS.

BANKRUPTCY COURTS.

MANCHESTER.

The Commissioner has received the following official notification:—"I am directed by the Lord Chancellor to inform you that having further considered the course that should be adopted under section 130 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, he is of opinion that inasmuch as the creditors in the several bankruptcies which may be pending in your court on the 31st December, 1869, could have removed such bankruptcies to the county court, it is fair to consider that they approve of their being proceeded with in your court; and that, therefore, their convenience will be consulted by his Lordship transferring all pending business to the county court of the town in which a district bankruptcy court holds its sittings, unless application be made to the contrary. I am to state that with regard to the appointments for last examinations and first meetings, which have been fixed by you in the ordinary course, that they should be left unmade, with protection given to the 28th January; and that, with regard to the adjournments, they should be made sine die with protection as aforesaid, leaving the parties in such cases to apply to the county court to which the bankruptcies may be transferred, to make the appointments.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Commissioner has received the following official notification, with a request that it might be posted up in Court:—"Notice is hereby given, that on the 1st day of January next, or as soon after as conveniently may be, an order will be made, pursuant to section 130 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, for the transfer of all the business of the Court of Bankruptcy for the Birmingham District, held at Birmingham. It is the intention to transfer all the business of the said court, including all bankruptcies which have not been, or shall not be, transferred by creditors, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, to any other county court, to the County Court of Birmingham, holden at Birmingham. The assignees, or any parties interested, may, however, at any time before the 20th inst., make application to the said district bankruptcy court, and show cause why any particular matter should be transferred to the London Bankruptcy or to any county court, and the Court of Bankruptcy at Birmingham will report to the Lord Chancellor what in its opinion will be the most convenient court for the further prosecution of the said matter, who, if he thinks fit, will make order accordingly."

In re Edwards Wood, solicitor.

Adjourned last examination and discharge.

Mr. Free appeared for the assignee; Mr. Griffin for an opposing creditor; and Mr. Collis, for the bankrupt.

At a former sitting the Court made an order for special accounts, and it was now stated that the bankrupt had been unable to comply with that order in time for the present examination, in consequence of the death of Mr.

Genever, the accountant. A discussion now arose as to the date to which the sitting should be adjourned, the Court ceasing to exist on the 31st of December.

The COMMISSIONER read an extract from a letter sent by direction of the Lord Chancellor. (The circular is identical with that quoted above, vide Manchester Bankruptcy Court.)

On the part of the bankrupt, Mr. Collis wished not to have the case adjourned sine die, and Mr. Free did not press for such an order.

Ultimately, his HONOUR adjourned the case for fourteen days.

Re E. A. Ward, solicitor.

Last examination and discharge.

Mr. Rowlands, for the assignee, said that the bankrupt had gone to Canada; and an order for proclamation was consequently made. Mr. Rowland said that the estate would yield a good dividend—probably 20s. in the pound.

COUNTY COURTS.

LAMBETH.

(Before J. PITT TAYLOR, Esq., Judge.)

Nov. 30.—Payne v. Graham.

Landlord and tenant—Agency.

The plaintiff in this case was tenant to the defendant. In a severe storm the zinc-work on the roof of the house in plaintiff's occupation was torn from its fastenings, and the rain poured in abundance through the opening so caused. The plaintiff immediately sent for a plumber, who, with a couple of assistants, succeeded, during the continuance of the storm, in restoring the zinc to its place, and temporarily fixing it. Two or three days afterwards the plumber, at the request of the plaintiff, put the zinc-work into a proper state of repair, at a cost altogether of £2 14s. 4d. On the plaintiff seeking to deduct this sum from his rent, the landlord refused to allow it because it was for work done without his authority.

Mr. PITT TAYLOR said that, as a rule, a tenant could not recover money laid out on his landlord's property without his consent, but a case of pressing emergency was an exception to that rule. The tenant had, however, gone beyond the emergency, which could only be considered as existing during the storm. During the two or three days between the performance of the temporary work and the permanent work there had been time to communicate with the landlord and obtain his authority, if he chose to give it. That had not been done, and the plaintiff could, therefore, only recover the sum of 12s. 3d., the items in the plumber's bill charged for the temporary work done on the day of the storm. The plaintiff was the defendant's agent to that extent, but no further. The judgment was, therefore, for the smaller sum only.

Mr. Duffett, attorney for the plaintiff, asked for costs, but his Honour refused, on the ground that the plaintiff had sued for a much larger sum than he was entitled to. He would be allowed the court fees on the one pound scale.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. ALBERT KAYE ROLLIT, LL.D., solicitor, of Hull, has been appointed Under-sheriff of Hull, for the ensuing year. Mr. Rollit is a son of Mr. John Rollit, solicitor, of Hull, with whom he is in partnership. He was educated at King's College, London, and matriculated at the London University in January, 1861; he passed his first B.A. examination in 1862, and was confirmed in that degree in the following year, taking a high place in both branches of examination. In 1864 he graduated as LL.B., with high honours, taking the third place in the first class in the "principles of legislation," second in second class in "conveyancing," was alone in the second class in "equity," and second in the first-class in "common law." The degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him in 1866, and he received the King's Medal by a resolution of the Senate of London University.

Dr. BORLASE has been elected coroner for Helston, in Cornwall, in the room of Mr. W. B. Forfar, solicitor, resigned.

Mr. C. KEELING, of the Manchester Bankruptcy Court, has been elected Clerk to the Local Board of Levenshulme, near Stockport, Cheshire.

Mr. WILLIAM OVERELL, solicitor, of Leamington, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds executed by married women, and also a Commissioner for taking affidavits in the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer.

Mr. GEORGE WISE, solicitor, of Boston, Lincolnshire, has been appointed Clerk to the Donington Turnpike Trustees, in the room of Mr. Henry Harwood, solicitor, resigned. Mr. Wise was certificated as an attorney in Trinity Term, 1862.

Mr. JOHN HESSEL PRIESTLEY, solicitor, of Barton-on-Humber, Lincolnshire, has been elected Solicitor to the Bluecoat Charity in that town, vice Mr. Brown, resigned.

Mr. HENRY EDWARD MASON, solicitor, of Barton-on-Humber, has been elected Solicitor to the Greycoat Charity in that town, vice Mr. Brown, resigned.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

IMPERIAL LAND COMPANY OF MARSEILLES (LIMITED).

Sir,—The enclosed circular has been sent to me. The call is justly due from me, as I have no doubt it is from the other shareholders.

Is it proper that a firm of solicitors should seek to induce shareholders to engage in litigation and endeavour to evade their liability by the offer of freeing them from the payment of costs? I enclose my name and address, not necessarily for publication, but I leave you to deal with the circular as you deem best.

A SHAREHOLDER.

London, Dec. 1.

8, Old Jewry,

London, 27th November, 1869.

Re The Imperial Land Company of Marseilles (Limited).

Sir,—Summons for balance orders having been served upon the shareholders who have not paid the £1 call made by the liquidators, we have been requested, as solicitors for the Committee of Shareholders, to take the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor as to the legality and propriety of this call.

Combined action being necessary, we shall also be happy to act for you in the matter if you will (by return of post) enclose us the summons you have received. By so doing you will incur no liability to us for costs.—We are, Sir, your obedient servants,

MICHAEL, ABRAHAMS, & ROFFEY.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(At Nisi Prius, before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE and a Special Jury.)

Nov. 26—Graham v. Porter.

The plaintiff, a solicitor of Enniskillen, sought to recover damages for an alleged libel printed and published by him regarding the plaintiff as a professional man. The alleged libel was published in a pamphlet, and the following was the passage complained of:—"Now, what practice can be more dishonest, more worthy of general and strong rebuke, than that of an attorney like Mr. Graham, who takes any case, no matter how bad and how false, to get his trumpety fee, trusting to the chances of law, or the absence of defendant, perhaps, to get an unjust decree against him, or, at all events, to give the greatest annoyance, and often serious loss of obliging him to leave his affairs and appear in a wrangling court." The incendo put upon this passage was that the plaintiff had been guilty of dishonest and improper conduct in his profession, and had promoted frivolous and vexatious litigation for the purpose of procuring gain for himself, and had endeavoured by dishonest means to obtain decrees against litigants. The plaintiff also complained of the following passage:—"It is sometimes said that the public feeling against attorneys is not just—that their profession is useful. . . . but readers can judge Mr. Graham's practice by this case. Surely this great evil, this disregard of right or wrong in our courts of law, will continue to thwart and check industry in Ireland till an honest and wholesome public opinion condemns such infamous practices." The defendant pleaded that the publication in question was not a libel, and that it was not printed and published in the defamatory sense alleged.

Serjeant Dowse, Falkiner, Q.C., and Holmes for the plaintiff.

Butt, Q.C., and Porter for the defendant.

Verdict for the plaintiff, £100 damages.

OBITUARY.

MR. T. B. BURCHAM.

The death of Mr. Thomas Borrow Burcham, magistrate of the Southwark Police Court, took place at Chingford, Essex, on the 27th November, after a painful and lingering illness, at the age of sixty-two years. Mr. Burcham was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1830, obtaining the third place in the first-class of the Classical Tripos. He was also a Junior Optime in the Mathematical Tripos of the same year. In 1832 he was elected a fellow of his college, and, never marrying, held his fellowship up to the date of his death. He was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1843, and went the Norfolk Circuit. He was appointed Recorder of Bedford in 1848, and was also for some years one of the classical examiners and an examiner in mental philosophy in the University of London, but these various posts he resigned in 1856 upon being nominated a stipendiary magistrate for the metropolitan borough of Southwark, on the death of Mr. Gilbert Abbot A' Beckett.

MR. J. WALESBY.

Mr. Joshua Walesby, solicitor, of Horncastle, Lincolnshire, expired on the 24th November. Mr. Walesby was certificated as an attorney in Hilary Term, 1834, and since 1836 he had held the office of solicitor to the Horncastle New Association, the duties of which he discharged to the satisfaction of his constituents. About eight years ago the members of the association presented him with a costly testimonial of their regard, at a public dinner held in his honour at the Exchange Hall. The late Mr. Walesby was a member of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and also of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

MR. WILLIAM WORMALD.

This gentleman, a solicitor, of Leeds, died on the 20th November, at the age of forty-eight years. Mr. Wormald was for about twenty-five years an assistant in the office of Mr. Robert Barr, clerk to the magistrates of Leeds.

MR. CHARLES SMALLRIDGE.

The death of this gentleman, who held the office of Clerk of the Peace for the City of Gloucester, took place somewhat suddenly on the 22nd of November, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Mr. Smallridge had been in feeble health for some time, but was able to attend to his professional duties until within a day or two of his death. He was admitted as an attorney in Michaelmas Term, 1821, and was appointed a proctor of the Consistory Court of Gloucester in 1825. In 1840 he was elected a town councillor, and continued to serve as a member of the Corporation of Gloucester until December, 1851, when he was appointed Clerk of the Peace for that city. He had previously served in the office of Mayor of Gloucester in 1850-1, the year rendered memorable by the opening of the Great Exhibition of London. The office of Clerk of the Peace, rendered vacant by his demise, is in the gift of the Corporation.

MR. J. G. WATKINS, JUN.

Mr. John Gregory Watkins, jun., barrister-at-law, died on the 5th November, aged thirty-two. He was the eldest son of J. G. Watkins, Esq., of Woodfield, Worcestershire, by Elizabeth Randle, the only daughter of John Parker, Esq. He was educated at Eton, and afterwards proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1861. He was called to the Bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1863, and has since practised on the Oxford Circuit.

MR. R. C. NICHOLL-CARNE.

We have to record the death of Mr. Robert Charles Nicholl-Carne, barrister-at-law, of Nash Manor, n Cow-bridge, Glamorganshire, which took place at his seat on the 24th November. The deceased gentleman, who was born in 1806, was the eldest son of the Rev. Robert Nicholl, of Nash Manor and of Dimlands Castle, Rector of Llanmaes (who assumed the name of Carne in 1842), by Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Captain C. Loder Carne, R.N., of Nash Manor. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1830, and for many years went the South Wales Circuit. In 1849 he was appointed constable of the Castle of St. Quentin, becoming thereby (ex officio) perpetual mayor of Cowbridge; he was also a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant of the shire of Glamorgan. Mr. R. C. Nicholl-Carne married, in 1833, Sarah Jane, daughter and co-heir of the Rev. Nathaniel Poyntz, M.A., of Alvescot House, Oxon. He is succeeded in the proprietorship of Nash Manor by his next brother, Mr. John Whitlock Nicholl-Carne, D.C.L., of Dimlands Castle, a barrister of the Inner Temple, who was a Commissioner in Bankruptcy from 1843 to 1847.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

THE SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The monthly meeting of the board of directors of this association was held at the Law Institution, London, on Wednesday last, the 1st inst. Mr. Wm. Strickland Cookson in the chair. The other directors present were Messrs. Harrison, Hedger, Nelson, Rickman, and Torr, Mr. Eiffé, secretary.

Grants of relief, amounting in the whole to £65, were made to several distressed widows of solicitors, members and non-members of the association, and other general business was transacted. The usual anniversary Festival in aid of the institution was appointed to take place in the ensuing year.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on Tuesday, the 30th November, the following question was discussed:—"Where one is in possession of title deeds relating to his own lands as well as to the lands of another person, who has no covenant for the production of the title deeds, has such other person a general right in equity to compel the production of the deeds?" The debate was opened by Mr. Gordon in the negative, but after a discussion, in which ten gentlemen took part, the society decided the question in the negative by a majority of 13 to 4. The number of members present was thirty-three.

Mr. Robert Baxter, solicitor, intends delivering an address upon the Ecumenical Council on Sunday evening, at the Young Men's Christian Association, Aldersgate-street.

Messrs. Sanderson & Campbell, solicitors, of Warwick, are candidates for the office of Clerk to the Magistrates of that division, rendered vacant by the death of Mr. F. Tibbits. In the meantime, Mr. Sanderson has consented to perform the duties of clerk until Mr. Tibbits' successor is appointed.

THE FACULTY OF ADVOCATES AND THE VACANCY ON THE BENCH.—At a recent meeting of the Faculty of Advocates, it was unanimously resolved, on the motion of Mr. Millar, Q.C., seconded by Mr. Jameson, Sheriff of Aberdeenshire, to request the Dean of Faculty to call the attention of the Court to suggested improvements in the arrangements connected with the Summary Debate Roll in the Outer House; and, further, that, in the opinion of the Faculty, continued delay in filling up the vacancy on the bench caused by the death of Lord Manor is not consistent with the due and efficient administration of justice.—Scotch Paper.

RAILWAY TRAVELLERS.—An important case has lately been re-heard before Mr. Greene, judge of the Bolton County Court. The action was originally brought by Mr. Corbridge, waste dealer, Blackburn, to recover 30s. from the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, under the following circumstances: In April last the plaintiff, who was the holder of a second-class contract ticket, went to the Bolton station for the purpose of proceeding to Blackburn. All the second-class carriages, however, were full, and the company's servants refusing to find him a seat in other than a third-class carriage, Mr. Corbridge went to Blackburn in a cab. This cost him 20s., and he alleged that he sustained an additional loss of 5s. 6d. by reason of not being at his place of business in time. The court awarded him 20s. damages; and on a new trial yesterday, at the instigation of the defendants, this decision was reaffirmed, and the plaintiff was allowed costs, amounting to from £12 to £15.—Daily Paper.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds have been heavy and dull this week, owing, it is everywhere said, to the troublesome aspect of Irish sedition, coupled with the inaction of the Government. Railways are rather stronger than the funds. Foreign securities have been inactive, but show a tendency to improvement.

This week has been issued, the prospectus of the Danubian Navigation Company (Lim.) The object is to acquire and extend the lighterage business in grain and other goods now carried on by Mr. Carnegie on the Danube, by means of large iron vessels towed by steam tugs. The capital is fixed at £50,000, in 5,000 shares of £10 each, and the entire amount is to be paid up on application and on allotment.

The salary of the Town Clerk of Barnsley (Mr. Peacock) has been fixed by the Town Council at £300 per annum.

The Prussian Lower House have just passed bills making the validity of marriages exclusively dependent upon registration before the judge, and introducing trial by jury for all political and Press offences.

Mr. Franklin Lushington has been appointed to the police magistracy vacant by the death of Mr. Burcham. Mr. Lushington was called to the Bar in January, 1853. He was for three years a member of the Supreme Council of Justice in the Ionian Islands, and at present belongs to the Midland Circuit. He was formerly a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, having been Senior Classic and First Chancellor's Medallist in 1849. Mr. Burcham was Third Classic in 1830, and was also a fellow of the same college. It is singular that twice running this appointment should fall to an eminent classic and fellow of Trinity.

The Civil Tribunal of Milan has just given its decision in a cause of some importance to English families, which has for some time been before it, between "La nobile Signora Carolina Augusta Tibaldi," born in London, of an English father, and a Scotch mother, and "Il nobile Signor Albano Gobetti," of Rovigo, now resident at Cairo as adjutant in the service of the Prince Hereditary of Egypt. Madame Gobetti, the plaintiff in the case through her counsel, Signor Raddius, asked the court to annul the marriage with Gobetti, which took place November 7, 1864, in the English Church, Milan, not the Waldensian Church, as stated in one or two journals. The court, after a full consideration of the case, decided accordingly, declaring the marriage invalid on several grounds:—1. the minority of the plaintiff at the time of the marriage; 2. her having no legal representative on the occasion; 3. due notice not having been given of the marriage; 4. the officiating clergyman not belonging to the religious persuasion of either of the parties; and 5, the marriage having been celebrated in a city in which neither of the contracting parties resided, or had passed the legal period in such cases.—Northern Paper.

ELECTIVE JUDICIARY.—The State of New York was, we believe, the first to open the judicial office to the choice of the people by annual election. It is now proposed by a new constitution, which is shortly to be submitted to the direct vote of the people, to provide for the establishment of a Court of Appeal, to consist of seven judges holding their office for fourteen years. This would be a great improvement, but it is further proposed, after 1873, to vest the appointments of these judges in the Governor of the State, to be held during good behaviour. The better class of the profession and order-loving citizens are anxiously looking forward to a return to the old English system, by which alone, as is remarked in a leading American law periodical, "the Bench can permanently retain its independence or its respectability." The evils resulting from the present system and the corruptions of the judiciary of New York were some time ago exposed in the most scorching way by the American Law Review, in language which seemed to despair of any improvement. When, however, a nation, boastful and bigoted though it be, begins to acknowledge that it has made mistakes, there is still it may be hoped a chance of improvement.—Canada Law Journal.

ERRATUM.—In our last issue the Cause-list of F.C. Stuart was, through an accident which occurred in lifting the type, ascribed to F.C. James, and vice versa.

LONDON, DECEMBER, 11, 1869.

THE VICAR-GENERAL of the Archbishop of Canterbury has, as we had anticipated (see S. J. Nov. 27), declined to allow the objections of Bishop Trower and the other "opposers" of the confirmation of the election of Dr. Temple to the see of Exeter. He has taken substantially the same view of his duty as was taken in the case of the late Bishop of Hereford, Dr. Hampden, by the then Vicar-General, Dr. Burnaby, but in one respect he has acted with greater discretion. In Dr. Hampden's case the counsel for the opposers, Dr. Addams, Dr. Harding (afterwards Queen's Advocate), and Dr. R. Phillimore (the present Dean of the Arches), were only suffered to address the Vicar-General on their right to appear (see 5 Notes of Cases, App., p. xx.). In the present case the proctor for the objectors was allowed to appear, and an elaborate argument on their behalf was heard from Dr. Deane. The present result is practically the same, but, by wisely permitting an appearance to be entered, and intimating that objections on questions of form would be considered, the Vicar-General has precluded the objectors from applying to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus. Their only remedy, if they have one at all, which is doubtful will be by appeal to her Majesty in Council. The Court of Queen's Bench will not, after appearance entered, and argument heard before the Vicar-General, and, indeed, cannot, having regard to the ordinary rules which govern their jurisdiction by mandamus, interfere with his decision on the merits of the case (see Reg v. Justices of Kesteven, 3 Q. B. 810). Under these circumstances, we presume, the matter will drop. To proceed would, indeed, as we have already pointed out, be a mere waste of time and money. For, even supposing the Judicial Committee decide that they can hear the appeal, and should consider that "opposers" can urge objections not only on points of form, as the Vicar-General has held, but also on points of substance, such as the alleged heresy of the candidate for confirmation, there is not the slightest doubt that in Dr. Temple's case such objections must entirely fail. They are based, we are now told, exclusively on his essay entitled "The Education of the World," an essay which unquestionably contains many propositions open to dispute at the hands of theologians, but nothing whatever capable—in the present state of the law—of sustaining a criminal charge of heresy.

A VERY IMPORTANT QUESTION was raised before the Master of the Rolls this day week respecting the rights, as to his costs, of a solicitor who has accidentally omitted to renew his certificate. The solicitor having in his possession documents of a client for whom he had been conducting litigation, and not having sent in his bill, the client obtained on petition the usual order to tax. On making the taxation it appeared that, during three months of the litigation, the solicitor had been without a certificate, his certificate having been, by a pure accident, not renewed at the proper time. The taxing-master thereupon, in accordance with what was stated to be the invariable practice of the office, disallowed all the costs of those three months.

The Master of the Rolls observed that the Act did not extinguish the debt, but merely took away the remedy. Guarding himself carefully against expressing any opinion as to what would have been the result if taxation had been on the application of the solicitor instead of the client, his Lordship held that as the order for taxation had been obtained (as is always the case) upon a submission to pay what should be found due, and as the Act did not take away the right to set off or retain in respect of the amount, the decision of the taxing master must be reversed.

That the enactment in question applies to the remedy only and does not extinguish the debt is sufficiently obvious. Indeed, the reference to Fulllove v. Parker (10 W. R. 581), to prove this was redundant. The instance is in that respect parallel to that of the Statute of Limitations. A creditor whose debt is barred by the statute may still use it as a set-off. There is, however, a difference; the solicitor's claim is liable to taxation by an officer of court, which the other creditor's is not. The question is whether this incidence to taxation deprives the solicitor of the advantage he could otherwise derive from the bare existence of his debt. There are several cases near the point, but none absolutely settling it. In Re Angell (6 Dowl. & L. N. S. 144) Coleridge, J., upheld the taxation of the master, who had struck out the items incurred during the time when the attorney was uncertificated, saying, "Is he (the master) to go through the mockery of taxing items which he sees the attorney is not entitled to recover?" And he held that the master was right in taking notice of the fact of the attorney having been uncertificated. This case is very near the question, yet when the attorney has money in his hands or a lien on papers the taxation would be by no means a mockery. The report in this case does not state by whom the order to tax was obtained. The submission of the client to pay whatever should be found due from him can hardly be relied upon either way. According to the intent with which the words are revolved in the mind of the contracting party, they may mean either a submission to pay the amount legally recoverable, or a submission to pay the whole amount fairly incurred.

The Master of the Rolls, then, holds that when it is the client and not the solicitor who asks the taxation, the items are to be allowed, but gives no opinion on the converse case. At any rate in the case before us the decision was right in its result, for it would have been exceedingly hard if the solicitor had lost his costs for a purely accidental slip. The question is of such importance that we shall discuss it again; we could not, however, allow the week to pass without giving it at least some notice. It serves, for one thing, to illustrate the absurdity of the certificate tax.

A STRANGE MISCONCEPTION appears to prevail with relation to "An Act for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt," the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62. We were aware that the general public, to a great extent, accepted the title of the Act as denoting its contents, but from a report in a South London local paper it appears that the misconception extends to where we little expected to find it,—the county court bench. We are told that an attorney applied to a county court judge for a judgment summons to be served out of the district, such summonses requiring the leave of the judge. His Honour refused leave on the ground that it was useless issuing judgment summonses to be heard next year, because imprisonment for debt would cease with the present year. It is difficult to believe that a judge could make such a statement in the face of the following passages from section 5 of the Act, "Any court may commit to prison for a term not exceeding six weeks, or until payment of the sum due, any person who makes default in payment of any debt, or instalment of any debt, due from him in pursuance of any order or judgment of that or any other competent court." This jurisdiction is only to be exercised on proof that the defaulter has or has had, since the order or judgment, the means to pay; and further on it is provided that "no imprisonment under this section shall operate as a satisfaction or extinguishment of the debt." This section seems to leave matters almost as they are at present as regards county courts, the main difference being that cases of obtaining credit under false pretences or other fraud, or making a gift, delivery, or transfer of property or concealment thereof (see section 13)—cases which are now, on very rare occasions, made the grounds of committal by county courts—are to be dealt with criminally, and the delinquent will be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year. The effect of the Act as regards county courts may, therefore, be summed up thus—the maximum power of committal for non-payment, the debtor having the means, is increased from forty to forty-two days, and the cases of obtaining credit under false pretences, &c., may be taken before magistrates who, instead of the present maximum of forty days of the county court, may imprison with or without hard labour for a year. It would probably be impossible to find in the statute-book so extraordinary or delusive a misnomer as the title of this "Act for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt." *

AT THE RECENT LEEDS WINTER ASSIZE three colliers, of the respective ages of 27, 24, and 19, were indicted for having set fire to a stack of hay belonging to a farmer living at Attercliffe, a suburb of Sheffield. All three prisoners pleaded "guilty," and the eldest, who had already been previously convicted of a similar offence, asked the presiding judge, Lush, J., to give them ten years' penal servitude. This, the learned judge replied, was exactly the sentence he intended to pass, but he regretted that the law had not attached a more deterrent punishment to the crime. It appeared that the stack had been fired without any attempt at secrecy, and that the prisoners gave themselves up, alleging that having been in the workhouse and not having subsequently got any work, they had set fire to the stack with the express intention of getting penal servitude. The men seemed both able-bodied and intelligent. Arson of this description has become sufficiently frequent to render the question worthy of consideration—whether it is not advisable to make some alteration in the penalties assignable? Arson to a stack is, by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 17, punishable with penal servitude for life or for not less than five years—or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years. Boys under sixteen years of age may also be flogged. Should not the same discretion be entrusted to the judge in the case of men? The savage selfishness which destroys the property and endangers the lives of others in this wholesale manner might be found amenable to that dread of the lash which proved such a deterrent to garotters.

THE CASE OF Kelly v. Kelly, upon which Lord Penzance delivered judgment on Tuesday last, is a remarkable one in many ways. The facts are startling. Had they not been amply proved on one side, and, in fact, admitted on the other, they would have seemed impossible. Mrs. Kelly had been married to her husband for five and twenty years, and there was no suggestion that they had lived on other than good terms. But being unable to obtain from him a very clear account of the terms of a will in which they were interested she wrote to her brother-in-law to ask him about the matter.

* Since the above remarks were written two other metropolitan county court judges have declined to allow judgment summonses to issue, but on an application being made to a third judge, with an intimation as to the construction put upon the Act by his learned brethren, he stated his dissent from their view, adding that he should continue his practice as heretofore.

This her husband came to know, and it was in his eyes an unpardonable offence. It is true she offered the fullest explanation of the whole affair, and showed that she acted from no suspicion of his straightforwardness in the matter. But that would not do—she must be brought to a sense of her sin; and with this end in view he commenced a course of systematic cruelty from which his wife has just been delivered by Lord Penzance. He did not strike her. He only loaded her with abuse, absented himself from her society, debarred her from all intercourse with her friends, forbade her to go out, and if she went had her footsteps dogged by those in his employment, took from her all control of money, deposed her from her position as mistress of his house, forbade the servants to obey her orders, put a hired housekeeper in her place; and this course he pursued until her health gave way under it, and paralysis, or even insanity, was imminent. On these grounds Mrs. Kelly sought and obtained a judicial separation. These facts are in themselves remarkable enough, and we commend the Rev. Mr. Kelly to the attention of those interested in the morbid anatomy of the human mind; but we notice the case for another reason. There have been plenty of cases of actual physical cruelty before the Court, and plenty of cases in which such physical cruelty has been accompanied and aggravated by such moral tortures, such persecutions without a blow struck, as those to which Mr. Kelly subjected his wife; but we are not aware of any case in which the question has before arisen in its naked form whether such persecutions as those perpetrated in the present case, if unaccompanied by actual violence, can amount per se to cruelty. According to the principles long well known and acted upon, there could be little doubt upon the matter. But it is not the less important to have the rule of law laid down with so much clearness and emphasis as it has been by Lord Penzance:—"If force, whether physical or moral, is systematically exerted for this purpose (that is, with the view of bending the wife to the husband's authority), in such manner, to such a degree, and during such length of time, as to break down her health and render serious malady imminent, the interference of the law cannot be justly withheld by any Court which affects to have charge of the wife's personal safety."

A CORRESPONDENT this week calls attention to an important point in stamp law. The Solicitor to the Board of Inland Revenue, it is stated, has recently, in construing section 16 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, declared that when a building-lease contains, as some building-leases do, a covenant by the lessee to expend a certain sum in building on the property, such lease should bear, in addition to the ad valorem stamp, a £1 15s. stamp as for a "lease not otherwise charged."

The latter part of the above section, it will be remembered, enacts that—

"In any case where any deed or instrument which shall be chargeable with any ad valorem stamp duty in respect of any sum of money yearly or in gross . . . shall be made also for any further or other valuable consideration, such deed or instrument shall be chargeable (except when express provision is made to the contrary is or shall be made in any Act of Parliament) with such further stamp duty as any separate deed or instrument made for such last-mentioned consideration alone would be chargeable with, except profession duty."

In Nichols v. Cross (14 M. & W. 42) the Court of Exchequer held, in 1845, that such a covenant in a lease was not a consideration requiring ad valorem duty. But this was under the 53 Geo. 3, c. 184, which contained no such sweeping clause as that above cited, and the decision seems to have been based upon the idea that the Legislature intended to levy the tax only on the rent or fine.

A covenant to build on the land to a certain value is certainly a "valuable consideration"; the question is— is it a "further or other valuable consideration"?

If every consideration which by possibility can be separated from the main one of the instrument is to entail an extra stamp, very great inconvenience may follow, though not quite, we think, to the extent feared by our correspondent.

It seems to us the fair and reasonable way of looking at the question to regard the covenant to build as a part of one principal bargain, and not as a separate matter. "There was but one object and one thing contracted for; the agreement had various terms, but all constituted but one agreement,"—said Lord Cottenham, in Squire v. Campbell, 1 My. & Cr. 479; and it seems to us that here is but one taxable consideration.

A CASE BEFORE LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD, yesterday, illustrated the inconvenience which may result from the course pursued by the Government in not filling up the vacant Lord Justiceship. The question before the Court was, whether there is any jurisdiction under the Railway Companies Act of 1867 to restrain proceedings by a creditor against a railway company after a scheme of arrangement has been confirmed and enrolled. His Lordship (reversing Vice-Chancellor Malins), held that the jurisdiction given by the Act to restrain creditors' proceedings is only a temporary one, applying to the period between the filing and the enrolment of the scheme, but that it does not exist after the scheme has been confirmed and enrolled. In the course of the arguments the case of Bowen v. The Brecon Railway Company (15 W. R. 482, L. R. 3 Eq. 541) was referred to. There Vice-Chancellor Wood held, that if a debenture-holder of a railway company recovered judgment against the company, he could only hold the fruits of the judgment as a trustee for himself and all other debenture-holders entitled to be paid pari passu with himself. Lord Justice Giffard, who had been counsel in that case, said that he had always entertained the gravest doubts as to the correctness of the Vice-Chancellor's decision, and had wished that an appeal had been presented from it. If the case before him turned upon the correctness of the decision in Bowen v. The Brecon Railway Company, his Lordship said that he should not like to decide it without the Lord Chancellor. But he added that he should like the question in Bowen v. The Brecon Railway Company to come before three judges. Supposing it had been necessary to raise this question, where, in the present state of the Court of Appeal, could the three judges be found?

IF MR. SUMNER is in the habit of reading the American Law Review, he will find in the current number a rather well-written article which by no means endorses Mr. Sumner's estimate of "the sentimental" as contrasted with the pecuniary grievance. After pointing out that the withholding of sympathy from the North in their struggle with the South is not a subject for international claims, the article concludes thus:—

"Great Britain, to use a phrase often heard in the New England court-houses, has offered 'to leave it out to men'—to submit the question to a fair and impartial arbitration. Payment of the money, under such circumstances, would be an acknowledgment of the wrong, and apparently all the practical reparation for it that can be made. The offer to submit to arbitration is very little, if at all, short of it.

"The position in which England stands at this moment is substantially this: She offers to make full reparation for all actual spoliation committed in violation of her neutral obligations, resulting from the want of suitable and proper legal provision for enforcing those obligations upon her subjects, or from the inadequate administration of such law in that behalf as was in existence; she has also invited us to join her in such new legislation, as to the duties of neutrals, as experience has shown to be needful. Under the circumstances, what more ought we to demand; and what other basis of negotiation does the nature of the case admit it?"

THE American Law Register for last month contains the report of a case upon a subject of general interest relating to the law of railways—viz., the legal effect of through tickets issued by one railway company over the lines of other companies as well as over its own line. The questions most likely to arise in these cases are, is the company that issues the tickets alone responsible to the holder of the ticket, or each company liable for what happens on its own line? And if each company is so liable, is the company that issued the ticket also liable on the original contract? Similar and even more difficult questions may arise in the case of goods. Do the first company, if liable over the entire journey, accept the goods as common carriers for the whole distance, or as ordinary bailees except over their own line? Are the subsequent companies liable, if at all, as common carriers or as simple bailees? &c., &c.

The tendency of the English authorities is to treat the contract by the company giving the ticket as a contract for carriage over the whole distance, and not as merely a contract for carriage over their own line (Great Western Railway Company v. Blake, 7 H. & N. 987). This question was raised in the recent case of Zunz v. South-Eastern Railway Company (17 W. R. 1096), but was not decided; it has been discussed in several other cases, but no very clear rule on the subject has yet been established.

The American case to which we allude is Knight v. Portland, &c., Railway Company, in the Supreme Court of Maine, which has decided that where through tickets are issued in the form of coupons, a separate coupon being given for the line of each company, such coupon tickets "are to be regarded as distinct tickets for each road, sold by the first company as agents for the other companies. The rights and liabilities of the parties are the same" as if the passenger purchased the coupons separately at the offices of the respective companies. Nothing can be clearer than this. The judgment, however, goes on: "But railroads may so issue their tickets, and so conduct themselves, as to have the purchasers understand that they undertake for the whole route, in which case they will be responsible to that extent;" and Blake v. Great Western Railway Company is cited as an authority for this.

This judgment, therefore, seems to leave open the question, what is the effect of the ordinary through-ticket which is not in the form of coupons? The principle of the decision, however, applies to these cases also, as the mere form of the ticket can hardly affect the rights of the parties. Doubtless, a company may contract to be liable for the acts of other companies, but the question is what is the legal construction of the ordinary contract of carriage. This decision offers a convenient solution of the difficulty, and is quite in accordance with recognised legal principles.

ACTIO PERSONALIS MORITUR CUM PERSONA.

Legal maxims are seldom of any use, either to the student or the practitioner. They always require so much explanation and so many limitations and exceptions before they can be received as accurate legal propositions that they are fit only to serve as the texts for the discussion of legal principles. We propose to make this use of the maxim at the head of this article.

The maxim itself is one of the most, if not actually the most, misleading of the well-known legal maxims. Taken in the ordinary sense of the words it means that a personal action dies with the person—i.e., does not survive to or against executors. This is not now, nor has it ever been, true. Personal actions do not, and never did, die with the person, but only some classes of personal actions are thus determined.

In the first place, personal actions now include, and always have included, all actions for breach of contract. The right to bring these actions survives, and always has survived, to the executor on the death of the person entitled to sue (except only where the injury to the deceased is purely personal, and causes no damage to the property: Chamberlain v. Williamson, 2 M. & S. 408), and the liability to such actions survives always against the executor of the person who has broken his contract.

Again, by 4 Ed. 3, c. 7, and 25 Ed. 3, st. 5, c. 5, executors are given the same right of action against trespassers on the chattels of their testator as the testator himself had in his lifetime. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 2, gives a somewhat similar right to executors to recover damages for injury to the real estate of their testator, provided the injury was done within six months before, and the action is commenced within one year after, the death of the testator. The same section gives a remedy against executors for damages done to real or personal estate by their testator, if the damage was done within six months before, and the action is commenced within six months after, the death. And 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, gives to executors of persons whose death has been occasioned by the wrongful act of another a right of action for such wrongful act.

In addition to all these classes of personal actions which undoubtedly survive to and against executors, there is another class concerning which the law is not quite so clear. We mean all those actions which spring out of a breach of duty arising from contract. Such, for instance, are actions for negligence in the carriage of goods or passengers, actions arising from negligence in the performance of some duty, as of a doctor, attorney, agent, &c.; actions by servants against their masters for the negligence of the master, &c.

In all such actions as these the plaintiff has, and has long had, the right to treat the action as one of tort or contract at his election. He may either treat the injury of which he complains as a breach of a duty, and so a tort, or as the mere breach of a promise. The general rule is that "wherever there is a contract, and something to be done in the course of the employment which is the subject of that contract, if there is a breach of duty in the course of that employment, the plaintiff may either recover in tort or in contract" (Brown v. Boorman, 11 Cl. & Fin. 44).

The question has sometimes arisen, Do these actions survive to and against executors? This is almost the same as asking, Are they to be considered as actions of tort or contract. It is not easy to quote any clear authority which settles the law decisively on this point, but it seems on principle that the action ought to be considered as one of contract, and that therefore it ought to survive the death of the person entitled or liable thereto.

A tort is defined in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, as a "wrong independent of contract." This definition, therefore, excludes all wrongs not independent of contract, and therefore excludes the wrongs which we are discussing—viz., those which spring out of a breach of duty arising from a contract. A single example will illustrate this very clearly. A agrees to drive B. from X. to Z., and drives negligently, thereby causing an accident which injures B. B. is clearly entitled to a right of action against A., and it seems also clear that this right is founded on a contract between A. and B. They agreed to occupy the respective positions of driver and passenger, and it was from this relation that the right of B. to be driven without negligence arose. The infringement of this right by A. gave B. the right of action. It is hardly possible to dispute this, and if so B.'s right of action is founded on contract, and therefore would survive, like any other action for breach of contract to his executor, and against A.'s executor if A. or B. died before action commenced; subject only to the exception that if B.'s injury caused no damage to his property (which, however, it generally must do for doctor's fees, &c., unless death follows rapidly) the right of action would not survive to B.'s executor, although this would not, of course, affect the right of action against A.'s executor on A.'s death.

The fact that it was necessary to pass Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) to create the right of action thereby given is no argument against what we say. That right of action differs entirely from the right of action possessed by the deceased in his lifetime. A person injured by the wrongful act of another can recover damages for his personal injury as well as for the pecuniary loss caused thereby. The right of action under the statute is to recover compensation for the pecuniary damage caused by the death to the persons specified in the statute. Lord Campbell's Act, therefore, gives an entirely new measure of damages, even where the executors of the deceased might have maintained an action before the statute, and it also gives an action which did not before vest in the executors, where the injury to the deceased caused no pecuniary damage to him, as where death was caused instantly by the negligence of the defendant, or where the wrong was a pure tort unconnected with any contract.

In fact, the only reason for treating these actions as springing from a tort and not from a breach of contract is that the plaintiff has long been permitted, as we have stated, to employ the procedure applicable to an action for a tort or that applicable to a breach of contract, at his option. This, however, is a mere question of procedure, and does not affect the nature of the original right of action. This option to choose between two different forms of action was originally allowed to a plaintiff as a matter of convenience to him under the old rules of pleading, which did not allow a plaintiff to join counts in tort and in contract in the same declaration. This is well explained in Govett v. Radridge (3 East, 62, 70). This principle therefore seems clear, and extends not only to cases which we have specified, but also to actions against common carriers, although there are some arguments against this principle in the case of common carriers which do not exist in the other cases.

Common carriers are bound to carry goods, and are therefore no doubt under a duty to carry which is wholly independent of contract. If goods are given to them to be carried, and they refuse to do so, they are liable to an action of tort for such refusal. If, however, the goods are accepted for carriage there is at once a contract between the parties. If nothing is said about the terms on which the goods are to be carried, it is assumed that the carriers take them subject to all the liabilities imposed upon common carriers at common law. The carrier may, however (apart from any statutory provisions), make any agreement with the owner concerning the carriage of the goods that the two parties may choose. The fact that a duty existed on the part of the carrier before the goods were received does not prevent that being a contract which, but for such duty, undoubtedly would be a contract between the parties. There seems therefore every reason for treating the liability of common carriers who have assented to carry goods as one springing from contract, as in the case of an ordinary bailment, and as such liable to the incidents of survivorship after death peculiar to rights of action arising from breach of a contract.

Although we venture to say that the liability of a common carrier with respect to goods and passengers (independently of the effect of statutes) arises from contract, and that a neglect of this duty is substantially a breach of contract, we are not ignorant that there is more than one case which may be quoted against this proposition. In Tattan v. Great Western Railway Company (8 W. R. 606) it was held that an action framed in tort against common carriers for the loss of goods was not an action of contract within the provisions of the County Court Acts as to costs. Marshall v. York, &c., Railway Company (21 L. J. C. P. 34) also appears an authority in accordance with the principle of Tatham v. Great Western Railway Company. These cases, however, when looked at closely, are not necessarily opposed to the proposition that we have laid down. In Tattan v. Great Western Railway Company the question turned on costs alone, and on the wording of sections of the County Courts Acts, and the decision was that, as the plaintiff's action was in tort, the consequences of that form of action must follow, although, no doubt, the decision is not rested on these grounds. Marshall's case was an action against common carriers for loss of luggage by a person who had not contracted for the carriage of the luggage. This action clearly was not one springing out of the contract for the carriage of the luggage, because the plaintiff had not, although a third person had, contracted with the defendant for such carriage. It must also be remembered that the decision of Alton v. The Midland Railway Company, which we shall notice immediately, was subsequent to these cases, which must now be read in connection with that decision. It seems therefore that rights of action for breach of duty arising from contract, whether against common carriers or any other persons, ought, on principle, to be treated as actions for breach of contract, and liable to all the incidents of such actions.

So far we have dealt with the question on principle; but there is authority in favour of the view we have expressed. Knight v. Quarles (4 J. B. Moore, 532) and Alton v. The Midland Railway Company (13 W. R. 918) are the two most important cases on the point. Knight v. Quarles was an action against an attorney for negligence by the executor of a client of the attorney. The declaration alleged an express contract with the defendant, a breach of the contract, and damage to the deceased's estate. It was held on demurrer that the declaration was good. This, it will be seen, although an important authority, is yet open to the observation that as an express contract, breach and damage were alleged, and by the demurrer admitted, there could not well have been any other decision, but that the case does not necessarily go further than that. There is, however, a dictum in the judgment that if a passenger in a coach who has contracted to be safely carried is injured by the negligence of the coachman, and sustains pecuniary damage in getting himself cured, his executor may sue the coach proprietor in contract for compensation for such damage.

In Alton v. The Midland Railway Company a servant became a passenger by the defendants' line, and was injured by their negligence. The plaintiff, his master, sued the defendants for the loss to him of his servant's time, &c. Held that the action would not lie, as it was one of contract, not tort, and that therefore none but the parties to the contract could sue for a breach of it. In this case Willes, J., cites, and with approval, Knight v. Quarles, and the dictum we have mentioned expresses his opinion that if a passenger by railway took luggage with him which was lost by the negligence of the company, the executor of the passenger could sue for the loss of the luggage.

There is no further direct authority of any weight upon this point, but when we see that the authorities, so far as they go, are in favour of treating actions for breach of duty springing from contract as actions for a breach of contract, and not as actions of tort, and when we consider how thoroughly that is in accordance with the general principles of the law of torts and contracts, and with the definitions of those actions, and also how obvious is the justice and convenience of rendering the estate of a deceased person liable and entitled to the pecuniary consequences of wrongs done or suffered by the deceased, we can have but little doubt that the actions with which we have been dealing do not fall within the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona.

EQUITY.

PAYMENT BY BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Ex parte Pearce, V.C.S., 17 W. R. 1077.

When goods are sold and delivered under a contract whereby payment is to be made in bills, the contract is in general essentially a contract to pay, remaining unperformed until payment of the bills. Thus in Copland v. Martin (9 Sim. 433) A. contracted with B. to pay him a sum by bills to be drawn by B. on and accepted by A. In the result A. only accepted a bill for part of the sum, and this bill was dishonoured on presentation. The Vice-Chancellor, notwithstanding Mr. Jacob's argument, was of opinion that the contract was a contract to pay by bills. If the bill given was dishonoured, no payment was made by the bill.

It is obvious that in every case where a bill or other representative of sterling coin is given in payment of a debt, there is an implied contract that the bill shall be paid at maturity, and that the bill is, in point of fact, a security for the payment of the debt.

There must, however, be no laches on the part of the person who has elected to take a bill in payment of a debt. In Peacock v. Pursell (11 W. R. 834) failure to present a bill at maturity was held to debar the holder from proving his debt in the ordinary way. He had taken a bill in payment of his debt, the effect of which was to create a security for the payment of his debt on the day when the bill became payable. He failed to present the bill, which he and nobody else had it in his power to do, and in the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas was thereby debarred from treating the bill as anything else than a satisfaction of his debt. So, too, in Smith v. Mercer (L. R. 3 Exch. 51), goods were to be paid for according to contract by approved bankers' bills, which were dishonoured on presentation for acceptance. The defendants were not parties to the bill and received no notice of the dishonour of the bill. As they had neither been called on to indorse the bill nor had received notice of the dishonour, the laches of the plaintiff in omitting either precaution debarred him from recovering the price of the goods in an action against them at the suit of the plaintiffs for the price of the goods sold by them to the defendants.

"PUBLICATION."—PROVISIONAL AND COMPLETE SPECIFICATIONS.

Re Bates and Redgate's Application for a Patent, L.C., 17 W. R. 901.

In Forsyth v. Riviere, Webst. Pat. c. 97, Abbott, C.J., held that where several persons simultaneously discover the same thing, the one who first communicates it to the world under the protection of letters patent is the legal inventor, and entitled to all the benefits of the invention. Under the present law (Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83) an inventor has choice of two methods of invoking the protection of the law. He may, under section 8, file a provisional specification describing the nature of his invention, or, under section 9, he may file a complete specification, particularly describing and ascertaining the nature of his invention. In the first case he does not make a "publication" of his invention, and he does not receive the protection awarded after publication that, is to say, he does get any rights as against the general public. But he may now experiment fearlessly, since he is protected against any consequences of the partial disclosure which he has made, may employ workmen, for instance, without apprehension, and if he proceeds to consummate his invention by obtaining letters patent, the patent will in general be dated as from the day on which he took the initiatory step of filing the provisional specification. But if his invention is so completely worked out that he can file a complete specification, by which he does make a "publication" or complete disclosure, then upon filing that complete specification he obtains for the limited period of six months the full rights and protection of a patent. In the principal case A. and B., unknown to each other, made the same discovery almost simultaneously. A. filed his provisional specification in October, B. filed his in November, but B. was the first to get a patent sealed, which he did in January, and afterwards A. coming to have his patent sealed found himself obstructed by B.'s patent for the same invention. Lord Hatherley was asked to seal A. a patent dated from the date of his provisional specification, but refused, holding that as B., without fraud, had got his patent already sealed no other patent could issue for the same invention.

Forsyth v. Rirere (ubi sup.) was cited in support of A.'s contention, but that case had no application, because a provisional specification is not a "publication."

FIRST CLASS STATIONS.

Hood v. North Eastern Railway Company, V.C.J.,
17 W. R. 1085.

What is a first class station? According to the definition by one of the engineers who gave evidence in the suit, adopted by the Vice-Chancellor, a first-class station is a station where all ordinary and fast trains, and occasionally express and special trains, stop. This disposed of the first objection raised by the company,—viz., the indefinite character of a landowner's stipulation with a railway company that a piece of land taken for the purposes of the undertaking shall be used as a first-class station.

The stipulation was a negative one in substance, though put in a positive form, and this enabled the Court to interfere (Catt v. Tourle, 17 W. R. 939, L. R. 4 Ch. 654).

Where, however, one of the contracting parties is a public company, another and more important question may be raised,—viz., whether the covenant be one the specific performance of which may interfere with the safety and convenience of the public.

The jurisdiction to enforce or refuse specific execution of a contract is quite discretionary, and the Court will probably exercise its discretion where to deny this species of relief would be to diminish the comfort, safety, or convenience of the public. It must be borne in mind that the state of affairs is often completely changed between the time when the covenant is entered into and the time when the specific execution of it is sought by the landowner, his heirs or assigns. A covenant to stop all trains at a certain road-side station may be reasonable enough when the line on which the station stands is a mere local line, but such a covenant may well become wholly unreasonable when the line becomes a link in the chain of through communication between London and the North. In such a case we should expect the Court to consider that the convenience of the individual ought to yield to the convenience of the travelling public, and, while admitting that the covenant was in itself capable of specific performance, to exercise its discretion to refuse relief, and leave the plaintiff to his remedy at law.

Railway companies, however, will not be permitted to set up the inconvenience to the public as a reason for not doing what they have to do where the omission has been determined and wilful. Where a landowner had withdrawn his opposition to a railway bill in consideration of the company agreeing to make a road in a particular manner, and the company made and opened for traffic their railway without having complied with their part of the agreement, they were not allowed to set up the inconvenience to the public by the interference with the traffic as a reason for not performing their agreement (Raphael v. Thames Valley Railway Company, 15 W. R. 322, L. R. 2 Ch. 147, reversing the Master of the Rolls on this point).

It must not be forgotten that railway companies are allowed to be incorporated, and private interests com-pulsorily subordinated to theirs, on the express ground of public convenience. This being so, it is surely competent for the Court where the conduct of the company had been bonâ fide to decline to exercise its discretion in cases where public convenience is sought to be subordinated to private interests. In an analogous case where public convenience required the widening of a bridge, and the company proceeded to do so, and for that purpose temporarily disturbed the adjoining soil which was vested in the plaintiffs, a motion to restrain them from so doing was refused with costs (Board of Works for Wandsworth v. London and South Western Railway, 10 W. R. 814); and in Attorney-General v. Ely, Haddenham, and Sutton Railway Company (16 W. R. 834) will be found a dictum of the Master of the Rolls to the effect that it is not the business of equity to compel a company who have in good faith constructed works for the accommodation of the public which are not strictly within their powers to undo it all, and do instead something which may be less convenient to the public, but within their powers.

No doubt the case made on behalf of the public must be a strong one, yet nevertheless it must be borne in mind that, as the Master of the Rolls said in Raphael v. Thames Valley Railway Company, it is the duty of the Court to remember that there is a class of persons who are not represented in suits by a landowner of this character, whose interests require to be carefully watched, and that class is the public.

COVENANT TO SETTLE AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

Dickinson v. Dillwyn, V.C.M., 17 W. R. 1122.

In a recent article on the subject of the above class of covenants in marriage settlements we ventured to question the decision in this case, and we proceed to explain more fully why we did so. The settlement upon the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Dillwyn having contained a covenant by them jointly and severally that they and all other necessary parties would concur and join in settling all property to which Mrs. Dillwyn, or her husband in her right, might thereafter become entitled, under the will or intestacy of her father, or under the will or intestacy of any other person or persons whomsoever, the question arose whether a legacy of £100, to which Mrs. Dillwyn became entitled under her father's will after her husband's death, and all her husband's property left to her by his will, were within the covenant and subject to the trusts of the settlement. The recitals did not qualify the generality of the terms of the covenant, the words used to describe the property being the same, and the Vice-Chancellor admitted that the literal expression applied to any property, but said that in the absence of authority he should hold that the recital applied only to property to which Mrs. Dillwyn should become entitled during her husband's lifetime, and that "thereafter" meant in fact during coverture. He then relied on the use of the words "join and concur," in the operative part, as showing, apart from the improbability of the husband imagining that the covenant should apply to what he himself gave, that the covenant did in fact only refer to joint acts of the husband and wife, which could only take place in the husband's lifetime, and supported his decision by Howell v. Howell (4 L. J. N. S. 242), and Reid v. Kenrick (3 W. R. 530), dismissing Stevens v. Van Voorst (17 Beav. 385) as irrelevant. Remembering that the Vice-Chancellor had already held that the £100 legacy was within the covenant, it is rather difficult to criticize his judgment, which is self-contradictory, the word "thereafter" being evidently as much applicable to the property coming to Mrs. Dillwyn under her father's will as to the other property. As far, however, as we can discover any principle underlying the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, it is one which, in several recent cases on the construction of wills, he has more or less openly adopted, and against which we seriously protest—namely, that of ascertaining what may be called the general intention of the instrument in question from his own estimate of what the parties probably meant, and then controlling the construction of particular words or expressions with reference to the assumed intention. The true principle is, that you may govern expressions in one part of a deed or other instrument by the expressed intention of the whole, but that you cannot, on conjecture, disregard the expressed intention, although such conjecture be founded on the highest degree of probability. Applying this well-recognised principle to the present case, it is clear that there was nothing in the settlement to qualify the ordinary meaning of the word "thereafter," and that if the covenant was intended only to affect property coming to the wife during the coverture, the settlement required rectification, and that the Vice-Chancellor did in fact rectify it without any evidence. The following observations of Lord Wensleydale, in Smith v. Osborne (6 W. R. 21, 6 H. L. Cas. 375) are very apposite to the present case:—"It is a wrong rule of construction to interpret a covenant, not according to the meaning of the words used, but according to what the parties may be reasonably supposed (judging from the circumstances in which they were placed) to have been likely to intend to do when they entered into the contract. This is a perversion of the word 'intention.'"

With regard to the force of the words "join and concur," in the case of Carter v. Carter, L. R. 8 Eq. 551, similar to the above, but in which, although neither those nor any like words were present, the Vice-Chancellor came to the same conclusion, as well as the fact that the £100 legacy was considered to be subject to the settlement, show how little importance could really be attached to them. It could hardly have been contended that property coming to the wife's separate use during the coverture was not bound, because the concurrence of the husband was unnecessary, and the use of the disjunctive "or" seems to remove any doubt on the subject.

Then as to the cases cited: Howell v. Howell we believe to have been erroneously decided, as we stated in our former article, where we pointed out its special character. Reid v. Kenrick was simply a decision that a covenant by the husband did not bind the surviving wife; but Stevens v. Van Voorst is, in our opinion, substantially identical with the present case, and we could have wished that the following passage from the judgment had been echoed by the Vice-Chancellor:—"I was desirous," said the Master of the Rolls, "to confine the operation of the covenant to the property which accrued to the wife during the coverture, but I have looked in vain for any words so limiting it, and I cannot do so without introducing express words for that purpose. I may speculate that it might have been intended, but I cannot decide on a speculation of probabilities; for I think it is not proper to go beyond the words of the clause, even if that may lead to results which it is not probable the persons could have intended."

We regret that this case was, as appears from the report, not really contested, and have dwelt on it at some length as involving a very important principle. It seems to have been forgotten by the learned judge in both cases that the covenants were covenants by the intended wives, and for the benefit, not of the husbands only, but of the children also, and ought to have been strictly construed in favour of the latter, the only remedy in case of the covenants being wider than was intended, being that of obtaining a rectification on the usual evidence.

One word in reference to the suggestions of a correspondent as to what the scope of such a covenant should be. In general we agree with his view, but think that in some cases, as for instance where the husband's settled property would be an insufficient provision for the children, and the wife's was all in expectancy, it would be expedient to bind the latter whenever it came into possession. We can imagine a case in which this not being done, considerable hardship to the children of a woman by a first marriage might ensue.

The question raised by our correspondent of the power to withdraw a gift to a married woman from the operation of her marriage settlement was discussed in Re Mainwaring's Settlement (14 W. R. 887, 2 L. R. Eq. 487). It was there contended that the obligation to settle was one affecting the wife's conscience, and therefore operated on the property when it came into her hands, notwithstanding any contrary expression of the wish of the donor; but the present Lord Chancellor took what we think to be the correct view, that the covenant only affected property which, consistently with its own nature and the mode of gift, the wife was able and free to settle.

REVIEWS.

A Treatise on the Law of Negligence. By THOMAS G. SHEARMAN and AMASA A. REDFIELD. New York: Baker, Voorhis, & Co. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1869.

The Mr. Redfield, who is one of the joint authors of this book, is not the same as the gentleman whose works on bailments and on railways we recently reviewed. Mr. Isaac Redfield, who wrote on bailments, is we believe, the best known of the two, not only as the author of several other legal works, but also as an ex-judge; and though neither has any reason to be ashamed of the works of the other, yet as they write in very different styles, they probably would each prefer not to be mistaken for the other. As much of the work on carriers and bailments was devoted to the question of negligence, we are naturally led to institute a slight comparison between the two books. We find little fine writing in the present work, nor are disquisitions on things in general introduced upon every opportunity, but both the text and the notes seem entirely devoted to the elucidation of the legal points really arising out of the subjects which the writers bring within the scope of their work. At the same time we miss the vigour and originality of thought of Mr. Isaac Redfield. The consequence is that those parts of the present work which are intended to deal comprehensively with the whole subject are, in our judgment, not so well executed as those which treat of specific branches, or, to speak more accurately, of the application of the general rules to specific cases.

As the writers point out in their preface they occupy a new field. There was, we believe, before this publication but one work in the English language dealing solely with the subject of actionable negligence, and this was a short treatise with some notes of leading cases by Mr. Hay, a Scotch advocate. There are also, of course, chapters on the subject in the various works on torts. This circumstance the authors allude to as an excuse for the defects there may be in the work; and undoubtedly it is much easier to arrange the subject conveniently and logically, when guided by the efforts of others who have, whether successfully or unsuccessfully, made the attempt first. We cannot congratulate the authors much on the plan of their work. There is no attempt whatever at an analysis of the subject, and it is one which, as it seems to us, may be elucidated very greatly by a mere analysis. Thus the mere statement of the three things necessary to make up a good cause of action for negligence, as for any other tort—viz., the existence of a duty on the part of the defendant towards the plaintiff, the breach of that duty, and the fact that the breach is the proximate cause of damage to the plaintiff, furnishes, as it seems to us, a hint at the solution of almost every point that can arise on the subject. It does not seem to us that any principle of arrangement is adopted in this work except perhaps that of putting the more important propositions before those that are less so, with an alphabetical arrangement where they may be considered upon an equality. We cannot better illustrate this remark, and at the same time convey to our readers what the work contains, than by giving the titles of the chapters into which it is divided in the order in which they appear. The general subject of negligence, Degrees of negligence, Contributory negligence, Parties to actions for negligence, Liability of masters for acts of servants, Liability of masters to servants, Liability of servants to third persons, Municipal corporations, Public officers, Animals, Attorneys and councillors at law, Bankers and bill collectors, Bridges, Canals, Carriers of passengers, Clerks and other recording officers, Injuries causing death, Driving and riding, Fences, Fire, Gas companies, Highways, Notaries public, Physicians and surgeons, Construction and maintenance of railroads, Railroad fences, General management of railroads, Real property, Sheriffs, Telegraphs, Watercourses, Miscellaneous cases of negligence, Measure of damages in actions for negligence.

Our readers will gather from the above that there is a large amount of useful information in this work, but they will be somewhat puzzled by the arrangement, especially by the collocation of public officers, animals, and attorneys. It will be seen, however, on further examination, that after the chapter on public officers the author suddenly breaks off into an alphabetical arrangement. Our opinion on this point has been challenged in the following passage in the preface:—

"The day will come, it is to be hoped, in which treatises expository of the common law will be arranged in strict logical order, each confining itself to, and exhausting, its appropriate subject; but that day has not yet arrived, and cannot arrive, until some new Pothier shall arise, and do for America and England what the first Pothier did for France. Meanwhile it may be that this volume, by approximating to the ideal standard of method more nearly than some other works, will contribute somewhat to this desirable consummation."

We have given our readers full materials for judging whether the volume does approximate to their ideal standard of method; we cannot say that it gets very near our own.

The American authorities on the subject of negligence are very numerous. This, no doubt, is caused in a great measure by the habit that appears to prevail in that country of reporting cases, the decision of which turns almost entirely upon facts. In consulting these cases one always observes that the decisions given seem characterized by a greater looseness of reasoning than we are accustomed to find on other points. This seems especially the case with regard to the doctrine of contributory negligence and its application to the case of children; but there are also other points, in reference to which the American decisions appear to us to have occasionally introduced elements of confusion. We are far from saying that the decisions of our own Courts are free from similar faults. One common cause of this we imagine to be the difficulty which judges, as well as other individuals, experience of confining the language used by them to what is strictly necessary to the decision of the case before them. General expressions occurring in judgments of course always require to be interpreted by the special facts with reference to which they are used: but this is more particularly the case in actions for negligence which usually turn on the special facts.

Of course all this very much increases the difficulty which the author of a text-book must experience; at the same time it gives him an opportunity of achieving a more important result. If he were to adopt an analytical method under headings of the more important propositions or rules of law, we think he might do very much towards elucidating the law. There is seldom much doubt about these general rules, though in each particular case there is difficulty in deciding whether the case comes within this or that rule. Each fresh decision is of course an illustration of the general rule within which the case is held to fall, operating, perhaps, as an extension, or else as a qualification of it. It is very seldom, however, that anything that can be called a new rule is laid down. The main thing, therefore, which such a writer would have to do, with each reported case of sufficient importance for him to use at all, would be to decide within which rule it came. When that had been done, it would constantly appear that expressions had been used in the case, apparently of general application, which ought either to be disregarded altogether as really irrelevant to the decision of the case, or at all events to be construed strictly secundum subjectam materiam, and limited in their application accordingly. As an instance, we may mention the much misunderstood case of Hole v. The Sittingbourne Railway (9 W. R. 274, 6 H. & N. 488). In that case will be found expressions from which the liability of a person employing a contractor might be taken to be much greater than it really is. The case, however, must be considered as really decided on the ground that the damage arose from the very act contracted for, and not merely from the manner of its execution. It thus comes within a well-known rule, and is not a case in which an employer was held liable for the negligence strictly so called, of the contractor.

We have said so much about the method and plan of the subject, because we think not only that the authors have, for want of a sufficient logical analysis, failed to avail themselves of an opportunity of clearing away a good deal of confusion on various points, but also that almost all the fault we have to find is due to this cause. Thus, we think, sufficient prominence is not given to the fact that negligence is necessarily a correlative term, and that it cannot exist in law in the absence of a duty between the parties. We do find this or something like it stated incidentally in various parts of the work, yet it is not introduced, as it seems to us it should be, as the first question in every case. Distinctions are drawn between tortious negligence and culpable negligence, as well as between gross, ordinary, and slight negligence; yet we venture to think that the only way in which such distinctions can readily be appreciated is by reference to the different and distinct duties the breach of which these classes of negligence respectively describe.

The authors, however, appear to entertain a different opinion, for, in remarking upon the case of Southcote v. Stanley (1 H. & N. 247), they profess themselves unable to appreciate the reasoning of any of the English judges; and suggest, in the place of the rule laid down in that case, that a host should be held responsible for gross negligence, whether consisting in misfeasance or in nonfeasance. This amounts, we suppose, to leaving it to a jury in every case to say whether or not the host shall be held liable. The rule, however, laid down by Baron Bramwell seems to us perfectly intelligible and also reasonable—viz., that there is a duty cast upon the host not by careless acts to injure his guest, but that there is no duty to put the place in a safe state to receive him. In fact, that the invitation to a guest is to come and take the place as it is. Again, in the discussion of the question of contributory negligence, the authors adopt a theory which it appears to us is untenable, and which probably would have been avoided, if an analytical method had been adopted. They say that the rule which denies relief to a plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence is based less upon considerations of what is just to the defendant than upon grounds of public policy, which require in the interests of the whole community that every one should take such care of himself as can reasonably be expected of him. They say that it is part of the same policy which makes suicide a crime, and which punishes vagrancy and idleness. We venture to think the origin of the doctrine is a much simpler one—viz., that the plaintiff in order to recover must prove that his injury is caused by the negligence of the defendant, and that he fails to do so, when it was caused even in part by his own fault. The maxim In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis applies. That this is so is clearly shown by the fact that if the injury would certainly have occurred notwithstanding the exercise of due care by the plaintiff, his omission to take such care is immaterial and does not deprive him of his relief. In fact, the test is in all cases, could the plaintiff have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence? If he could, he cannot say that the defendant caused his injury, and so he fails. It is probably out of this curious notion of punishing a negligent plaintiff by depriving him of his relief that the American Courts have established a difference between the case of an infant and an adult plaintiff. We have several times alluded to this subject, and need only say that it is clear that there is no such distinction made in England (the case of Lynch v. Nurdin (1 Q. B. 29) having been long ago explained away, except), of course, that defendants are held to know that infants cannot take so much care of themselves as adults, and therefore may be bound to exercise rather more care towards them.

The authors have been somewhat unfortunate in having overlooked the case of Fletcher v. Rylands (L. R. 1 Ex. 265, and 3 English and Irish Appeals, 330). Many later cases of far less importance have been quoted, but this, in our judgment the most instructive case on the subject in England for many years past, appears to have escaped attention. The judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn in the Exchequer Chamber, afterwards approved in the House of Lords, not only disposes most effectively of the particular point raised in that case, not perhaps a very important one, but also explains the whole theory under which inevitable accident becomes a defence in cases where prima facie there is a trespass. Not only might this case have much assisted the authors of this work on many points, but it would probably have prevented their falling into what we cannot but regard as a distinct error with regard to what the common law of England was in respect of liability for accidental fires. We apprehend that there is no doubt but that by the common law an occupier of land was liable for the spread of such fires to his neighbour's land, fire being one of those things which, before the passing of the statutes on the subject, a man had to keep in at his peril, as was said in Fletcher v. Rylands. Another somewhat important case in our House of Lords (Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 Scotch App. 326) is not referred to, though the point, which was the principal one in that case, is discussed at considerable length, and a decision which appears contrary to that of our House of Lords is arrived at.

We have not space to go through in detail the various cases with which the authors deal, and with which, as we said at the outset, they deal much more satisfactorily than, in our opinion, they do with the general subject. The headings of the chapters which we have given will show the subjects which the work embraces, and notwithstanding the infinite variety of circumstances under which actions for negligence may be brought, we think it will seldom occur, for the future, that a case will arise, for which a precedent more or less in point cannot be found in this volume.

Law of Patents for Inventions, with Explanatory Notes on the laws as to the protection of designs and trade-marks. By F. W. CAMPIN, Barrister-at-Law. London: Virtue & Co.

The preface announces that "this treatise was not written for the instruction of lawyers, being intended to convey reliable practical information to inventors and patentees, engineers, mechanics, manufacturers, and others interested in patent matters; nevertheless, the writer believes it will be found to be useful to the members of the legal profession, since it sets forth the state of the law resulting from decisions more recent than those of any other work published up to the present time." In our opinion, Mr. Campin has introduced too much technicality into this little treatise. A carefully digested summary, in a popular form, of the leading rules of patent law would be a very excellent book; the present work, however, is scarcely lucid enough to come up to this standard.

We must not, however, be understood to mean that the work before us has no merits, on the contrary the lay public may derive from it a large amount of information on patent law.

COURTS.

COURT OF THE VICE-WARDEN OF THE STANNARIES.

Re Prosper United Mining Company.

Companies Act, 1862—Winding-up of cost-book mine—Lien of labourers for tribute on ore sold by official liquidator.

The labourers' lien for tribute on ores raised in a cost-book mine does not extend to the ore when in the hands of a purchaser from the official liquidator.

But, semble, in the case of a solvent company, the labourers might, if unpaid, obtain, in a creditor's suit against the company, an injunction against the sale.

This case was heard at the November sittings of the Court.

His Honour the VICE-WARDEN now gave judgment:—

This was an unregistered company, i.e., a common law company, usually called a cost-book company. A petition was filed to wind up the company, by certain creditors, on 14th August last, which was made absolute on 27th August. Shortly before the petition was presented a distress by the lords of the mine was put in, which if proceeded with by sale would have considerably damaged the works, and have stopped the working. The lords submitted to a stay of their proceeding on condition that all their rights should be reserved, and that meanwhile the company should be allowed to carry on their works until the result of the hearing of the petition. After the 27th August possession was taken by the officer of the court, who, by the course and practice of the court, represents the official liquidator when no one else is appointed. Upon the taking of possession, the Court, in the interest of all parties, sanctioned the continuance of the working for the benefit of the estate. The same agents and managers of the company continued to be employed under the sanction of the Court, and carried on the works under the several setts or pitches theretofore subsisting as between the company and its labourers, subject to a future sale of the property of the company when it should be judged expedient. The ordinary effect of this state of things is that the temporary working of the mine is to be carried on at the expense, not of the Court, but of such funds as the liquidator can command out of the assets of the expiring company, sales of ores, &c., &c. The sale of all the remaining property of the company was eventually advertised for the 14th September last. The prospectus of sale specified "all the machinery, materials, and effects upon and within the mine belonging to the company." Ores were not specified, though I believe they were meant to be, and might be, included in the word "effects." At the sale the auctioneer was asked questions as to the ores to be included in the sale. This was a natural and proper question, and the reply given by the auctioneer, and confirmed by Mr. Marshall, then present at the sale and attending in his character of official liquidator, and representing both the company and the Court, was in effect as follows, viz.: That all the ores broken, underground or on the surface, were to be sold and would pass to the purchaser; that whatever the Court could sell would pass to the purchaser; that all the ores and materials would be handed over to the purchaser; and that "all the costs of the mine would be paid down to the day of sale."

The question is a simple one, and arises as between the official liquidator and the purchaser. It is not a question, as stated by the advocate for the claimants in court, as between the working labourers and this Court; their right to tribute was not, and never was, disputed by anybody. The only matter for my decision is the question who is to pay them. As to tribute, the setts or pitches were made bi-monthly, and the first workings after the order absolute to wind up were under a sett, or setts, made on the 6th August last, and the costs of the working will be determined by reference to the bargain then made between the company and the miners. Since, three more setts, or pitches, or tribute were added by sanction of the official liquidator in September for a limited time, determinable on the sale of the property. I do not feel able to distinguish one class of these setts from the other. In both the working was by sanction of the Court, and every expense of the working down to the sale was chargeable on the company, i.e., on the assets or funds in the hands or under the control of their official representative. In my judgment the tribute must be regarded as part of those expenses or costs with which a purchaser ought not to be charged. It is very probable that a different opinion may have existed in the mind of Mr. Marshall or his legal adviser. I presume that the ground of this was the opinion that the tribute is an intrinsic lien on the ore so broken, and adheres to it as liens do in some well-known instances, and that to sell free from that lien was beyond the powers of a liquidator. I cannot accede to that view, though it may be that for some purposes there is such a lien. If, for example, a solvent company were to sell ores before the labourers were satisfied, they might apply to this Court with success for an injunction on filing a creditors' suit against the company even if the company had paid all other wages except the stipulated tribute. I, therefore, decide this case in favour of the purchaser, and declare that he is free from liability to the tributers for any such back costs of working between the 27th of August and the 14th of September. I authorise the official liquidator to pay the taxed costs of this hearing out of the assets in court, if, or as soon as there be such available.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner BACON.)

Dec. 9.—Solicitors' Costs.

Upon an application by a solicitor, presenting a petition for adjudication against a bankrupt himself for payment of his costs up to the meeting for the choice of assignees out of the bankrupt's estate in priority to other charges, except those of the official assignee and messenger,

His Honour remarked, that to refuse the application he must repeal the rule of court, and disregard the constant course of practice in such cases. The costs of the solicitor presenting the petition were to be paid out of the first moneys received, subject to the payment of the official assignee and messenger. A person who took upon himself the duties of assignees was not bound to bring actions, and, if he did do so, he might obtain the indemnity of creditors; but that was no reason why he should deprive the solicitor of that to which he was fairly entitled; and as the assignee had caused trouble and expense to the solicitor by bringing him to the court, for the purpose of enforcing a demand which ought to have been satisfied without any trouble and expense, he must pay the costs.

Bagley, for the solicitor; R. Griffiths, for the assignee.

APPOINTMENTS.

Sir FRANCIS HASTINGS CHARLES DOYLE, Bart., Receiver-General of Customs, and a barrister of the Inner Temple, has been appointed a Commissioner of Customs, in succession to the late Mr. Ralph W. Grey. Sir Francis is the only son of Sir Francis Hastings Doyle, the first baronet, who was Deputy-Chairman of the Board of Excise and Deputy-Lieutenant of the Tower of London, by Diana Elizabeth, daughter of the late Sir William Mordaunt Milner, Bart., of Nun Appleton, Yorkshire. He was born in 1810, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford (first class in classics, 1832); he became a fellow of All Souls' college, and graduated B.C.L., in 1843. In November, 1837, he was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple, and for some years went the Northern Circuit. Sir Francis Doyle was appointed in 1845 Assistant Solicitor of the Excise, and in the following year became Receiver-General of Customs, which office he ever since continued to hold. He succeeded his father in the baronetcy in 1839, and married in 1844, Sidney, fourth daughter of the late Right Hon. C. W. Williams Wynn, M.P. Lady Doyle, by whom Sir Francis had several children, died in 1867. It is stated that the appointment of Receiver-General of Customs, the emoluments of which are £1200 per annum, will not be filled up.

Mr. GEORGE SLADE BUTLER, solicitor, and registrar of the Rye County Court (Circuit No. 50), has succeeded to the office of High Bailiff of that Court, rendered vacant by the death of Mr. C. F. Lewis. This arrangement has taken place in accordance with the provisions of a recent Act of Parliament, providing for the gradual abolition of the office of high bailiff. Mr. Butler's admission as an attorney dates from Hilary Term, 1843, and besides the county court magistracy, he holds the office of Clerk of the Peace for the borough of Rye.

Mr. HENRY JOHNSON CARR, solicitor, of Leeds and Pudsey, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the West Riding of the county of York.

Mr. EDMUND NEWMAN, solicitor, of Trafalgar-house, King's-road, Chelsea, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the City of London, the county of Middlesex, and the city and liberties of Westminster.

Mr. ARTHUR WHITEHEAD, solicitor, of Wimborne Minster, Dorset, has been appointed a Commissioner for administering oaths in chancery in England. Mr. Whitehead is a member of the local firm of Rawlins & Whitehead.

Mr. SAMUEL HALL, of Bacup, Lancaster, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the county of Lancaster.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

STAMPS ON BUILDING LEASES, &c.

Sir,—Allow me to call attention to a recent decision at Somerset House on this important subject. The Solicitor of Inland Revenue has just put a construction, in the matter of a building lease, on the 16th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, which will, I submit, seriously affect such of these and of very many other deeds as have been executed since 1854. The latter part of that section enacts that "in any case where any deed or instrument chargeable with ad valorem stamp duty in respect of any sum of money, yearly or in gross, is made also for any further or other consideration, such deed or instrument is to be chargeable (except where express provision to the contrary is made in any Act of Parliament) with such further stamp duty as any separate deed or instrument made for such last-mentioned consideration would be liable to, except progressive duty." Upon this, the solicitor rules that a building lease containing a covenant by the lessee (as nearly every such lease does) to expend money in building requires to be stamped (in addition to the ad valorem stamp on the rent) as a "lease not otherwise charged, £1 15s"; in other words, a lease which has just been charged ad valorem as such, is now to be further charged as a "lease not otherwise charged."

If this ruling be correct, then every deed which contains a covenant or other clause, beneficial to any, however small, an extent to the grantor or lessor, beyond the money consideration for it, must bear a 35s. deed stamp in addition to the ad valorem stamp, though the latter may perhaps only amount to 6d., and, of course, cannot be given in evidence without it.

I admit that the Legislature can, by express words, pass such an enactment as this, but I contend that the Court of Exchequer will not so construe the almost incomprehensible clause just quoted. The cases of Nichols v. Cross (14 M. & W., 14 L. J. Ex.), Phillips v. Morrison (13 L. J. Ex.), Pearson v. Inland Revenue (L. R. 3 Ex. 242), and the opening "Observations on the Stamp Laws" in Hayes' Concise Conveyancer, may be referred to as leading to this conclusion.

I shall be glad to hear from any one who is interested in the discussion of this subject, for if this ruling be correct so many deeds made since 1854 must be wrongly stamped, that a retrospective Act (after the precedent of Preston's Act in 1814, consequent on Wright v. Wakeford and Dee v. Peach) should be applied for. The Legislature will doubtless see the justice of saving the public from numberless penalties because their solicitors were unable of themselves—and their text-books would not help them—to discover that a lease or other deed which is chargeable, and stamped ad valorem, should also be stamped as a "lease or deed not otherwise charged."

IMPERIAL LAND COMPANY OF MARSEILLES, LIMITED.

Sir,—Our attention has been called to a letter which appeared in your issue of the 4th inst., signed "A Shareholder," wherein the writer asks "whether it is proper that a firm of solicitors should seek to induce shareholders to engage in litigation, and endeavour to evade a liability by the offer of freeing them from the payment of costs?"

We reply "certainly not," and indignantly repel the insinuation contained in "A Shareholder's" letter, which is entirely uncalled for by the circumstances of the present case.

Those who instruct us, representing the bulk of the shareholders and creditors, have in that capacity undertaken to defray the expense of the necessary proceedings.

In their view the call is altogether unnecessary and unjustifiable, and the only object they have in resisting it is to save the unfortunate shareholders from further loss.

MORTGAGE OF LIFE POLICY—TACKING.

Sir,—A. assigns, by way of mortgage, a policy of assurance on his life to B. B. forthwith gives the usual notice of the assignment to the insurance office. C. in ignorance of such mortgage takes a mortgage of the policy, thereby becoming second mortgagee for securing £100, and gives notice of it to the office. The mortgagor asks B. to lend him a further sum, without disclosing the second mortgage. Would B., in the absence of any notice of C.'s security, be entitled to tack any subsequent advances made by him in exclusion of C., or would he be bound to inquire of the office, before making such subsequent advances, as to their having received notice of any intermediate incumbrance? IRELAND.(From our own Correspondent.)

DUBLIN, Thursday.

All the courts here have been, since the commencement of the after-sittings, busily occupied in the disposal of records, but no case of peculiar importance, from a professional point of view, has arisen.

With respect to the recent Tipperary election the impression abroad is that no petition will be presented by Mr. Heron, or anyone on his behalf, to the Court of Common Pleas under the recent Parliamentary Election Act, inasmuch as such a petition, relying upon the disqualification of O'Donovan Rossa, would place Mr. Heron, who is a strong advocate of the movement in favour of the amnesty to political prisoners, in a false position with respect to many of his constituents. It is believed that many of those who, at the recent polling, gave their votes for O'Donovan Rossa, did so under the impression that by electing him they would force upon the attention of Parliament their wishes with respect to him and his fellow-prisoners. If there is no petition the matter must be dealt with by Parliament itself, and the question whether or not a person convicted of a treasonable offence amounting to felony, but not the subject of capital punishment, can be returned to Parliament, must be decided by the House; in other words, they must say whether or not a conviction for an offence which under the old law would have rendered a witness incompetent to give evidence, and an elector incapable of voting, does, when not attended by corruption of blood, render null and void the votes knowingly given for him.

OBITUARY.MR. R. G. BRADLEY.

The demise of Mr. Robert Greene Bradley, Barrister-at-Law, of Slyne House, near Lancaster, has been recently reported. The deceased gentleman, who was born in 1788, was the only son of the late Robert Bradley, of Slyne (who died in 1825), by Margaret, daughter of the late Thomas Greene, Esq. He was called to the Bar at Gray's-inn in June, 1814, and became a Bencher in May, 1837. In 1839 he was Treasurer of his Inn. He was formerly a commissioner of bankrupts for the district of Lancaster, and held the commission of a magistrate in the county of Lancaster. The late Mr. Bradley married, in 1820, Lydia, daughter of the late Francis Boynton, Esq., of Hutton Lodge, near Castle Howard, East Yorkshire.

MR. GEORGE LAWTON.

This gentleman, who was for many years a proctor and notary of the ecclesiastical courts of York, died on the 1st December, at Nunthorpe, at the advanced age of ninety years. Mr. Lawton was for a lengthened period registrar of the archdeaconry of the East Riding of York.

MR. E. HOOKER.

The death of Mr. Edward Hooker, solicitor, formerly of Sheerness, took place at Queenborough, in the Isle of Sheppey, on the 27th November, at the age of seventy-seven years. The late Mr. Hooker was for many years secretary to the Sheerness Waterworks, and to the Sheerness Steam Packet Company.

MR. M. BLOOME.

Mr. Matthew Bloome, solicitor, late of Leeds, died at Aberford, on the 28th November. He was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1813, and was a member of the Leeds firm of Bloome & Dawson. For many years Mr. Bloome was clerk to the trustees of the Leeds and Selby, Tadcaster and Halton Dial, and Seacroft and Scholes turnpike roads.

MR. HENRY YOUNG.

We have to record the death of Mr. Henry Young, solicitor, of Essex-street, Strand, who expired suddenly at his residence in Russell-square, on the 1st December, having obtained the age of seventy-two years. The deceased gentleman was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1819, and was the senior partner of the firm of Young & Jacksons. He was for some years solicitor to the Governors of Harrow School, and also to the Economic Life Assurance Society of London. Mr. Young was a member of the Incorporated Law Society, and likewise of the Law Association for the benefit of widows and families of professional men in the metropolis and its vicinity.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.*LEGAL EDUCATION.

The Committee having recommended Legal Education as one of the subjects for discussion at this meeting, I have thought it not inappropriate, as one who took part in what is known as the Leeds movement of last autumn, that I should explain to you the result of our endeavours.

Mr. Justice Hannen, in June, at the annual dinner of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, spoke of our branch of the legal profession in the following terms, a part of which I may be pardoned for reading.

After adverting to the objects of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association he said:—"From whatever point of view that society was regarded, everything which exhibited prudence and generosity was a quality which everyone acquainted with the solicitors of England must be prepared to say attained the highest place among them. No one could have associated as he had done for more than twenty years with the solicitors of London and the country generally, without knowing that there was no class of men amongst whom generosity was more signally exhibited at every turn of their career than solicitors, and no men were more willing to contribute sums of money, or their talents, to objects of real charity. On the other hand, it was found that amongst solicitors prudence was one of the highest qualities developed by them—namely, that prudence which they all relied on as their guide and support in any difficulty and emergency that might arise. He would say for his own part that the solicitors appeared to him to set an example which it might be well followed by the branch of the profession to which, until recently, he had the honour to belong. Take, for instance, the way in which the solicitors were known to have built themselves up into a power of the realm. Beginning, as it were, with a mere law club, they had gradually raised into power that noble institution the Law Society, and they had not used it for selfish purposes only, but for the purpose of raising the character of the members of their own branch of the profession. In another sense the attorneys made one body with the Bar; and, indeed, though he was not sure he was not now about to express an opinion which might be opposed to the views of some gentlemen present—and he had never been afraid of being in a minority—he believed all good opinions had been in a minority once, and he must be contented to be so until that minority grew into a majority; but he did not hesitate to enunciate his opinion that the two branches of the profession might well be amalgamated. No one knew better than himself that the duties of an advocate were entirely different from those of a solicitor; but as in many other cases he knew no means of drawing a sharp dividing line, they merged into one another, and a man who began his career did not know until he had been practising for years for what he had the greatest fitness; and he believed it would be well to leave it to a man to find out the opportunities that might arise of calling forth the qualities and talents that were in him, and so leave it to such occasions to develop whether or no he had a better capacity for carrying on the business of a solicitor than the profession of an advocate. He believed it was peculiar to England that the two branches of the profession were separated, and not only peculiar to Englishmen, in the largest sense, but peculiar to the country, for in almost all of our colonies the two branches of the profession have been amalgamated. He was not aware of any inconvenience that arose from it, and there could be no better training for a young barrister than to devote himself to the business of a solicitor."

It is unusual for our branch of the profession to be spoken of in terms so complimentary, and the question of the fusion of the two branches of the profession coming from a member of the bench, it appeared to me to furnish a very interesting topic for discussion at our annual congress. When, therefore, the meeting last year fell through I thought it would be a pity that the matter should be allowed to go to sleep, and as Leeds had special attractions in the shape of the Arts Exhibition I took the liberty of addressing the president of the Leeds Law Society and suggested that his society would invite the Law Societies of Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Newcastle, and Hull, to meet at Leeds and discuss the matter. It was then quite too late to invite this association to hold its annual meeting there. The suggestion was fortunately addressed to one who had long ago considered the subject—namely, Mr. Bulmer, of Leeds, for it appears that in the year 1851, he read a paper on this very subject at the annual meeting held that year at Birmingham. The Leeds Law Society adopted my suggestion and invited a conference, limited, as I had suggested; if, therefore, any person feel aggrieved that they were not summoned to that meeting, I trust they will be satisfied with this explanation.

The meeting was held at Leeds on the 28th September, and after hearing Mr. Jevons's most able paper on the relations between the two branches of the legal profession and discussing Mr. Justice Hannen's speech, and the report of the Inns of Court Commission of 1855, the following resolutions were unanimously agreed to:—

1. That the present status of our branch of the legal profession and their exclusion from all offices of honour and distinction is unsatisfactory and injurious to the interests of the public, especially having regard to the fact that before admission to our branch of the legal profession examination of a stringent character as to knowledge of law is required, whilst in respect to the bar no test of legal knowledge is necessary.

2. That the tendency of modern legislation to continue and extend the exclusion of attorneys from various offices and appointments for which their education and training specially qualifies them, calls for united action on their part to remove this injustice, and that it is only necessary to call the attention of the bar and the public to the matter in order to ensure their co-operation in devising a remedy.

3. That this meeting is of opinion that the time has come when provision should be made for the foundation of a law university, which should be open to both branches of the profession without distinction, and that the means of providing an institution already exists in the funds at the disposal of the Inns of Court and Inns of Chancery which were originally common to both branches of the profession.

4. That the foregoing resolutions and the paper of Mr. Jevons be referred to a provisional committee for consideration, with instructions to invite the co-operation of the bar and of our branch of the profession generally, and to report to a future meeting to be summoned in such mode and at such place and time as they shall determine.

An executive committee was then formed consisting of Messrs. Bulmer, Marshall, and Simpson, of Leeds, Mr. Ryland, of Birmingham, and Mr. Jevons and myself, of Liverpool, with power to add to our number. Shortly afterwards Mr. Frank Parker, of Bedford-row, was added a joint secretary with Mr. Jevons.

The foregoing resolutions, a copy of Mr. Jevons's paper, and of the report of the Inns of Court Commission, were forwarded to the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, and to the Metropolitan and Provincial Association, and they each appointed a committee to consider the subject, and to meet the executive committee of the society formed at Leeds.

At the request of the Leeds Executive Committee, a very interesting and able paper was written by Mr. Marshall, of Leeds, styled "A Sketch of the Early History of Legal Practitioners, and of the Inns of Court and Chancery," which, I think, shows clearly our right to share with the Bar the large endowment possessed by the Inns of Court and Chancery. Our committee also prepared and circulated a scheme for a University of Law. Several meetings were held of this associated committee in London. We discussed first the resolutions prepared at Leeds, and these were rather severely criticised, and in result they were elaborated into the seven following resolutions, which were really answers to propositions put into the shape of questions. The first of these is as follows:—

1. It would be right that the regulation as to admission to the Bar should be placed under Act of Parliament, as is the case as to attorneys and the medical profession.

2. It is not right that the benchers of the Inns of Court should have the uncontrolled power of making rules which may place attorneys in a position more restricted than the rest of the public as to the right of admission to the bar.

3. That compulsory examinations ought to be established as to both branches of the profession.

4. The establishments of the Inns of Court and the Inns of Chancery should be, under legal control, made subservient to purposes of legal education.

5. We think it is not right that barristers should be allowed to exercise the offices of registrars in bankruptcy and probate, of common law masters, and of solicitors to the public departments, without passing such examinations as the law has imposed on every solicitor before he can become qualified to be appointed to the same offices.

6. It is not right that a barrister should be held irresponsible as to the performance of legal work, for the doing of which he has accepted fees, while a solicitor is held responsible.

The last of these resolutions then follows:—

7. It is not right that the rate of remuneration for the solicitor should be governed by fixed tariffs, whilst barristers, physicians, civil engineers, and other professional men, are allowed to determine for themselves their rate of remuneration.

The Leeds Executive Committee were then requested to prepare, for the consideration of the associated committee, a draft memorial, based on the above resolutions and propositions. At a subsequent meeting a draft petition prepared by the Leeds Executive Committee was submitted and discussed. Several gentlemen from all parts of England joined our association.

Finding that the report of the Inns of Court Commission was out of print, and formed rather too bulky a blue book for circulation, we at once resolved to print the report of that commission, to recall attention to the recommendations for providing some test of educational knowledge for students for the Bar. As some gentlemen present may not be acquainted with the composition of that commission, I may here be permitted to give the names of the commissioners, and to give a short extract from their report.

The Chairman of that Commission was the present Lord Chancellor, and the other members were Sir John Coleridge, Sir Joseph Napier, Chief Justice Cockburn, Lord Westbury, Sir Erskine Perry, Sir John Lefevre, Mr. Justice Keating, Mr. Greenwood, and the late Mr. Lavis, of our branch of the profession, and they were appointed "to inquire into the arrangements in the Inns of Court for promoting the study of the law and jurisprudence, the revenues properly applicable, and the means most likely to secure a systematic and sound education for students of law, and provide satisfactory tests of fitness for admission to the bar."

After reviewing the evidence adduced before them the following passages occur in the report:—

"We have hitherto considered the question of the education of a barrister on general principles, and on those grounds alone have come to the conclusion that there ought to be a test both of the general and the professional knowledge of every candidate for the bar.

"But we are fortified in this conclusion when we look to the course adopted by the learned professions, as well as in the subordinate branch of the law.

"The clergyman, the physician, the surgeon, the apothecary, as well as the attorney or solicitor, are all required to pass an examination before they are permitted to practise.

"In every other country in Europe an educational test is applied to advocates, either by requiring a degree in law at a university or else by a distinct professional examination.

"In arriving at this conclusion with respect to the necessity of a test, we desire to be understood as not disparaging or undervaluing the present system of practical study in a barrister's chambers, which must be admitted to be very efficient in fitting a student for the active duties of his profession; it affords, however, no facilities for the study of the scientific branches of legal knowledge, including under that term—constitutional law and legal history; and civil law and jurisprudence. Some knowledge of these subjects must be useful to the barrister, and although during the ordinary period of preparation for the bar it would probably be found impracticable to obtain an entire acquaintance with them without sacrificing objects more immediately pressing, yet there would be time enough to lay the foundation of this knowledge, which might be completed after the student should have been called to the bar, and before his time became wholly absorbed by practice.

"By mastering principles the student becomes more interested in and obtains a steadier grasp of practical details.

"The most convenient method of acquiring knowledge of these subjects is by lectures followed by examination applicable both to the lectures and to the subjects generally."

They then sum up the matter by saying—

"We think that considerable advantage would result to the bar as a liberal profession, from a better recognised and more definite and permanent combination of the Inns of Court, in reference to legal education and examinations, than exists at present, in respect of the Council of Legal Education; and that the Inns of Court might be united in a university, still preserving their independence respectively as distinct societies, with respect to their property and internal arrangements. Such a university might not only regulate the examinations to which we have adverted, but might likewise confer degrees in law."

Then follows a scheme for a university, with a sketch of the course of study, and the commissioners then say—

"We have not thought it to be within the scope of our commission to consider whether it would be expedient to associate the advocates of Doctors' Commons with the great body of the profession who are members of the Inns of Court, but there would, as it appears to us, be very little difficulty in rendering them constituent members of the university, if it were thought desirable."

The same remark, doubtless, applies to our branch of the profession.

The Commission of 1855 had no power to inquire into the system of education for students intending to be attorneys, and they therefore omit to suggest that the attorneys should be allowed to share the advantages of this university.

What has been done since this report was issued? Practically nothing.

Some lectureships have been founded; but no compulsory examination is required before admission to the bar.

In the meantime, nearly a million of money has been received and spent by the Inns of Court, and the study of the law, so far as relates to the admission to the bar, is not materially benefited.

Now it appears to me that there never was a time more opportune than the present for considering this question in all its bearings.

Every institution is undergoing a searching criticism by the public, and their various shortcomings are being weighed, and why is the bar to be exempt?

The Inns of Court have had the opportunity of reforming themselves, and have not availed themselves of the opportunity, and the time has come when we must expect Parliament to take the matter in hand.

There are many members, both of the bench and bar, who are greatly dissatisfied with the present position of matters; and the scheme for a law university, open to both branches of the profession alike, has been favourably received by many.

I may mention that the Leeds Executive Committee waited upon the Lord Chancellor with a copy of the scheme we had prepared, and he expressed his general approval of it, and we have also had several interviews with Sir Roundell Palmer, who, we have reason to believe, will support the scheme if brought before Parliament.

At the suggestion of the Lord Chancellor, copies of the scheme for a law university were sent to the various Inns of Courts, but, hitherto nothing has been heard from them. But an important movement has begun amongst the bar and a joint committee, consisting of some eminent members of the bar, together with some attorneys, is being formed, and a bill for the formation of a law university has been prepared, and we have no doubt before the end of the year that a scheme framed by this united committee will be agreed upon.

And now I venture to ask this meeting what is to be the action of the leading members of our branch of the profession.

The Committee of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, in their report, say, "that they are not at present prepared to take action in the matter, even to the extent of petitioning the Lord Chancellor and the Houses of Parliament in favour of this scheme." They say the subject is too large to be disposed of without the most anxious discussion to which the council and the committee of its members will always willingly be parties. But the council consider that the opinion of the profession and the public is not at present sufficiently pronounced to justify them in attempting to procure legislation on the subject."

I have much pleasure in telling you how the Manchester Law Association have acted. They have sent a donation of £50 towards the expenses of the association. An example I hope other societies will follow, and show in the most practical form their sympathy and interest in the movement.

But there may be some gentlemen present who will say that whilst they are ready to admit the training of students for the bar to be objectionable and capable of great improvement, that there is no just reason why the present greatly improved method of examining articled clerks during and after their apprenticeship should be abolished and a university course substituted. To such a person I would answer that our present system is clearly deficient in the absence of any systematic teaching, and that it is quite possible for an articled clerk, who may have paid a high premium, at the end of two years and a-half on presenting himself for the intermediate examination, to know simply and absolutely nothing of law. I would ask if there can be any subject more likely to promote and advance the character and respectability of our branch of the legal profession than a higher standard of educational preparation in which, not practice, but the principles of law shall form a necessary part of the study? True it is that the principles of law do form a portion of the examination before admission as an attorney; but it is notorious that those principles are merely acquired by the reading of one or two treatises by the student, and that the main portion of an articled clerk's apprenticeship consists in office drudgery, or more frequently systematic idleness, to be atoned for at last by weeks of anxious coaching.

Of what class of men mainly do these consist who reflect little credit, or rather I should say, do discredit to our profession by either sharp practices or even the baser tricks of extortion? Am I not correct in stating that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred these have not only had an indifferent education in general knowledge, but have learned much of their cunning in the office of the man with whom they have served their apprenticeship.

A university course with a high moral tone would have a decided tendency not only to improve, but to eradicate this class from amongst us.

Great stress is constantly being laid on the need of a highly educated and enlightened bar, but is it not tenfold more important that our branch, who enter so much more closely into all the varied transactions of every grade of society, should be equally enlightened? The great and responsible duty is now cast upon us assembled at this meeting, because we are a meeting whose opinion must and will weigh, not only with the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, but with Parliament and the country, of asserting our desire, and I would fain add the stronger word of our fixed determination, that we will have a higher standard of education for those who wish to enter our ranks.

You may rest assured of one thing, not only will it meet with the hearty approval of the country, but those who succeed us will bless us in the greater sphere of usefulness and higher status in society which our exertions will have earned for them.

LAW ASSOCIATION FOR THE BENEFIT OF WIDOWS AND FAMILIES OF PROFESSIONAL MEN IN THE METROPOLIS AND VICINITY.

At the usual monthly meeting held at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane, on Thursday, the 2nd inst., the following directors being present:—Mr. Desborough (Chairman); Mr. Harding, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Clabon, Mr. Collisson, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Nisbet, Mr. Roberts, Mr. S. Smith, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Walker, Mr. Wynne, Mr. Whyte, and Mr. Boodle (Secretary); the following grants were made—viz., £20 to the son of a deceased member, who from serious illness is unable to follow his profession; £10 to the daughter of a deceased member, and £10 to the daughter of a deceased hon. member.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the society held on Tuesday, the 7th instant, Mr. Herbert in the chair, Mr. Galloway brought forward two motions, one relative to the mode in which members are balloted for; the other for permission to members to introduce irrelevant matter in discussing motions for adjournment, both of which were lost. The secretary also brought forward a motion, the object of which was the abolition of the 6d. fine imposed upon junior members for non-attendance. The discussion upon this motion lasted until 10 o'clock without the matter being decided, when the society adjourned. One new member was elected and two gentlemen were proposed as members. The number of members present was thirty-six.

THE EDMUNDS' SCANDAL.

The arbitrators to whom the Crown's claim against Mr. Edmunds was referred, and to whom also it was referred to make any recommendation to her Majesty's Government on account of any substantive claim of Mr. Edmunds against the Crown, or on account of any claim against the Crown in consequence of the reports of Messrs. Greenwood and Hindmarch, having sat eleven days in public, and having taken evidence and heard counsel, have made the following award:—

"We award and adjudge that, on the taking and adjusting of the accounts in the said order referred to, there is due by the said Leonard Edmunds the sum of £8,544 18s., including the sum of £3,033 16s. due from him on account of fees and emoluments received by him in respect of the parchments' account.

"And we award and adjudge that there are, having regard to all the circumstances, moral grounds for recommending the Government to relieve the said Leonard Edmunds from a part of the moneys due from him on account of the said fees and emoluments received by him in respect of the said parchments' account,—that is to say, to the extent of £1,402 5s., and we recommend accordingly.

"And we award and direct that the said Leonard Edmunds do pay to her Majesty the sum of £7,142 13s., being the amount remaining due from the said Leonard Edmunds upon the taking and adjusting of the said accounts, after deducting the said sum of £1,402 5s. And as to the said substantive claims brought before us by the said Leonard Edmunds against the Crown, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, we make no recommendation to the Government in relation to any such claims.

"And as to the said suit in Chancery, we award, adjudge, and decree that neither party has any claim against the other in respect of any matters in question in the said suit not concluded by the said decree or by this award.

"And we further award and adjudge that each party do pay his own costs, as well of the said Chancery suit as of the reference, and that the Crown and the said Leonard Edmunds do each pay a moiety of the costs of the award.

"In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands this 27th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1869.

"GEORGE DENMAN.

"CHARLES E. POLLOCK."

Mr. Edmunds, it will be remembered, had already (in Sept. 1864) refunded £7,872 5s. 6d.; this award, therefore, will bring the total to £15,014 18s. 6d.

In the Court of Exchequer an application was made, last week, on behalf of Mr. Alfred Leigh, formerly an attorney of Warrington, to be re-placed on the rolls. He was struck off in 1864, for misconduct in obtaining £130 from an old and illiterate farmer on false pretences. He had suffered six months' imprisonment in Flint Gaol, and had returned £70 to the old man, and counsel submitted that he should be reinstated, as having purged his offence. The Lord Chief Baron said the Court would not be doing their duty if they placed such a man in a position to obtain the trust and confidence of clients, and the rule was discharged.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Consols have been almost without movement during the week. Railways have been increasingly buoyant. Foreign securities, which at first were following the lead of the railways, subsequently declined upon unfavourable foreign advices. It is understood that the telegraphs will not be taken over until the end of January.

The Briton Medical and General Life Association has put forth a detailed statement of its assets, investments, and liabilities. The transactions of the past year are stated to have resulted in the addition of £45,000 to the assets.

WILLS OF DECEASED LAWYERS.—The will of Mr. William John Law, formerly Chief Commissioner of the Insolvent

Debtors' Court, was proved in the London Court on the 16th November, his personality being sworn under £45,000. The executors and trustees are Mr. Franklin Lushington, a barrister of the Inner Temple, who has just been appointed a metropolitan police magistrate; and Mr. Markham John Law, also a barrister of the Inner Temple, a son of the deceased gentleman. He has bequeathed his law-books to such one of his sons as may embrace the profession of the law.—The personality of the late Mr. Robert Greene Bradley, J.P., late a bencher of Gray's Inn, has been sworn in the Probate Court of Lancaster as under £25,000. He has left complimentary legacies to George Long, sen., and Mr. Thomas Greenwood, benchers of Gray's Inn, and also to Lord Romilly.—The will of Mr. John Goble Blake, F.S.A., formerly a member of the firm of White, Blake, Tylee, & Fawcener, solicitors, of Essex-street, Strand, has been proved under £50,000.

STOCKPORT.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. John Johnston, of Stockport, solicitor, a commissioner to administer oaths in chancery in England. By the deaths of Mr. John Boothroyd and Mr. T. M. Ferns, the number of commissioners in the borough was reduced to three—viz., Mr. Coppock, Mr. William Smith, and Mr. J. L. Vaughan. The appointment of another commissioner will be a public convenience for proving wills, and for other acts formerly required to be done before a Master Extraordinary in Chancery.—Stockport and Cheshire County News.

NEWCASTLE AND GATESHEAD LAW SOCIETY.—At the forty-third annual meeting of this society, held at Newcastle on the 2nd of December, the following gentlemen were elected members—viz., Messrs. Frederick Hewison, Alfred J. Blount, C. J. Garbutt, W. G. Davies, J. G. Joel, Nathaniel Dunn, and John Barr. The following gentlemen were the officers elected for the ensuing year:—Mr. James Radford, solicitor, Gateshead, president; Mr. William Stephen Daglish, solicitor, Newcastle, vice-president; Mr. Robert Richardson Dees, solicitor, Newcastle, treasurer; and Mr. Thomas George Gibson, solicitor, Newcastle, secretary.

A WISE ANSWER.—The celebrated Aboos Yusuph, who was chief judge of Bagdad in the reign of the Caliph Hadee, was a very remarkable instance of that humility which distinguishes true wisdom. His sense of his own deficiencies often led him to entertain doubts, where men of less knowledge and more presumption were decided. It is related of this judge that, on one occasion, after a very patient investigation of facts, he declared that his knowledge was not competent to decide upon the case before him. "Pray, do you expect," said a pert courtier, who heard this declaration, "the Caliph is to pay your ignorance?" "I do not," was the mild reply, "the Caliph pays me, and well, for what I do know: if he were to attempt to pay me for what I do not know, the treasures of his empire would not suffice."—Malcolm's Persia.

LONDON, DECEMBER, 18, 1869.

WE PRINT IN ANOTHER COLUMN a letter from a Metropolitan County Court Judge upon a subject to which we have frequently called the attention of our readers, the anomalies of county court jurisdiction. And we have the more satisfaction in publishing this letter because, the whole subject of county court jurisdiction having now been referred to the Judicature Commission, it is eminently desirable that the defects of the existing county court system should be thoroughly understood, in order both that the Commissioners may have as much assistance as possible from without in forming their judgment, and that their recommendations, whatever they prove to be, may be fully and intelligently weighed.

Our correspondent explains with great clearness the broader features of that part of the subject with which he deals, and shows forcibly the purposeless and systemless character of the present law. But had the limits of a letter allowed, he would have found, we are sure, no difficulty in adding a multitude of details to his picture really grotesque in their absurdity. He points out for example the fact that an action of tort may be sent to the county court, whatever the amount in dispute may be, while an action of contract can only be sent if the amount in dispute does not exceed fifty pounds. There are many other peculiarities of this branch of jurisdiction. If an action of contract be sent to a county court after issue joined, it may be sent to any court. If sent before issue joined it can only be to a county court in which it might have been commenced. An action of tort, whenever sent, may be sent to any county court. A suit in equity can be sent from a superior court only to the county court in which it might have been brought. An Admiralty cause, however trivial, and notwithstanding the high standard of county court jurisdiction in Admiralty matters, cannot be sent from a superior court to the county court at all. Again, an action of contract sent after issue joined remains an action in the superior court to the end of the chapter; the judgment is entered, the costs taxed, and a new trial, if necessary, moved for in the superior court. The same cause, if transferred before issue joined, or an action of tort, whenever transferred, becomes a county court cause; the judgment must be entered, and the costs taxed in the county court, and the county court alone can grant a new trial. Nor are these by any means isolated examples. They are fair specimens of the absurdities which run through every detail of the county court system. We strongly commend to the attention of our readers the letter of our correspondent, whose position entitles him to speak with peculiar authority upon this subject.

WE REPORT IN ANOTHER COLUMN a decision of the Master of the Rolls, on the employment of "puffers," or fictitious bidders, at sales of land by auction. "The Sale of Land by Auction Act, 1867," was passed to assimilate the practice in equity to the practice at law—the courts of common law holding, that where a puffer has bid, the right of bidding on behalf of the vendor being reserved, the sale is absolutely void: Beznell v. Christie, (Cowp. 395); while it has been held in equity that a vendor may, without special notice, take steps to prevent his property going at an under value, without thereby vitiating the sale: Smith v. Clarke (12 Ves. 477). In Mortimer v. Bell (14 W. R. 68), Lord Cranworth observed that the courts of law would not allow the vendor, without express stipulation, to interpose a bidder; while the equity courts always allowed the vendor to fix a reserved price. As to the actual employment of "puffers," the equity courts were in some uncertainty. There was however, a long string of cases against the validity of sales so effected, and in Mortimer v. Bell, Lord Cranworth upset a sale, where two had been employed at once. Lord St. Leonards was of opinion that the courts of law should adopt the equity rule; the late Lord Justice Knight-Bruce, and it appears also the present Master of the Rolls thought the contrary. The Legislature adopted the latter view. The Act of 1867, after reciting that there had been a conflict between law and equity, and that even in equity the rule was unsettled, enacted that "puffing" shall invalidate in equity as well as at law; and the 5th section enacts that in every case the conditions of sale shall state whether the land is sold without reserve, or subject to a reserved price, or whether a right to bid is reserved, and that, if it is stated that the sale will be without reserve, or to that effect, it shall not be lawful for the seller to employ any person to bid, or the auctioneer to take knowingly any bid from any such person. There is no penalty for not making this statement in the conditions; but the Master of the Rolls, in effect, holds the meaning to be that silence is equivalent to a statement that nothing is reserved. In Gilliatt v. Gilliatt, the case alluded to, the conditions stated that there was a reserved price, but mentioned nothing about bidding. One puffer had been employed, who did not, however, bid up to the reserved price, and, on this latter ground, it was contended that the sale was valid; the Master of the Rolls, however, upset it, observing that the enactment was plain, that if the vendor meant to reserve a right to employ a bidder, he must say so.

THE LAW'S DELAYS have ever been a favourite topic with public writers and speakers; the law's dispatch and promptitude rarely find a chronicler. A remarkable instance, however, of the rapidity of the movements of the Court of Chancery, occurring only a few days since, ought not to be unrecorded. Some property of the Landed Estates Company, distant about twelve miles from London, was, in the course of one forenoon, invaded by a body of men, who commenced digging up a portion of it, in assertion of the supposed right of their employer. At two o'clock information was received at the London offices of the company of these proceedings, and at three o'clock instructions were given for the filing of a bill for an injunction to restrain the defendant. With the assistance of several shorthand writers a bill was written from dictation and placed in the hands of the printers, together with a plan of the estate, and an affidavit. These were printed off with the utmost speed; the bill was filed the same afternoon in the court of Vice-Chancellor Malins, and the learned judge, after hearing counsel, granted the injunction. By seven o'clock in the evening a messenger, accompanied by a body of police served a copy of the injunction upon the parties who were still upon the ground, and who were forthwith removed. Such a rapid movement is perhaps unparalleled.

THE JUDGMENT in the case of Dawkins v. Lord F. Paulet, delivered on Monday last in the Court of Queen's Bench, will prove a land-mark in the law of libel. The question arose upon demurrer to a replication, and was simply whether a communication, admitted to be privileged, was, under the circumstances stated on the record, rendered actionable if alleged to have been made with express malice. At first sight there would seem little doubt on the matter. The ordinary rule of law unquestionably is, that malice deprives a person of privilege. If we might coin a maxim we would say "malitia tollit privilegium." But, in Colonel Dawkins' case, the majority of the Court have held that a different set of considerations must govern. He sought to recover damages for a libellous statement made as to his military conduct by the defendant, his superior officer, to the Adjutant-General. The defence was, in substance, that Lord F. Paulet was acting in the discharge of his duty in making the statements complained of. To this the plaintiff replied that the defendant was actuated by malicious motives. This replication Mr. Justices Mellor and Lush have ruled to be bad, on the ground that the matter of complaint was purely military, and one cognisable, under the Mutiny Act and Articles of War, only by a military tribunal. The late Mr. Justice Hayes was of the same opinion, but the Chief Justice, on the other hand, held that the action was maintainable.

The question involved is one of extreme importance, and affects the status of every officer and soldier in the British army. We shall take an early opportunity of recurring to it, with a view of considering whether the Articles of War are in truth so stringent as to oust the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of law. The proposition of the majority of the Queen's Bench judges is certainly startling, and we should not be surprised to find that a Court of Error, if appealed to, will decline to assent to it.

THE OVEREND & GURNEY PROSECUTION has at length reached Guildhall, and until the verdict has been given we shall abstain from any comments which might tend to a prejudication of the case. Whatever is to be said for and against perfect freedom of press discussion of proceedings before chancery judges, there can, we think, be no question of the impropriety of prejudging a case pending before a jury. Some of our daily contemporaries have disregarded propriety in this matter, and published articles which, if there were anyone who cared to raise the question, would certainly be considered a contempt of court.

THE Times Money Article of last Monday contains some remarks on the hard position of directors, who may be prosecuted under the Larceny Act without the sanction of the Attorney-General being necessary, whereas, before a trustee can be proceeded against under the same Act, the sanction of the law officer must be first obtained. Some correspondents, also of the Times, ascribe to the badness of the Court of Chancery, the wreckers, and the official liquidators also, the general commercial mistrust and depression which they deplore.

"At the present moment," says one of them, "there are numerous undertakings of great importance, and which are urgently required, which, although they have received the sanction of Parliament, cannot be executed because they cannot raise money on account of the distrust which exists."

As to the point on the Larceny Act, we certainly know of no reason why the sanction of the Attorney-General should be necessary for the prosecution of a trustee, but not for that of a director. As to the practical hardship which has resulted to directors from the distinction, it amounts simply to nil. Everyone who has kept up an acquaintance with the legal reports of joint-stock cases has been astonished and disgusted at the countless flagrant instances in which the subscribers to concerns have been nothing short of swindled by the promoters, and yet there has never been a conviction under section 84 of the Larceny Act, and until quite recently there had never been a prosecution. It is not the fault of the Act that the worst cases within its scope are never prosecuted at all, or that the contagion of joint-stock immorality has extended even to the proceedings by which it was intended to be punished and repressed. We are certainly not surprised to hear that there are numerous undertakings which cannot raise their capital on account of the general distrust of companies which the disclosures made in and since 1866 have generated. Considering the amount of rotten undertakings which have been exposed during the last few years, the scores upon scores of concerns started without hope of success—many of them established for the express purpose of being wound-up, considering frauds by which all these things have been accomplished, the concoctions of the railway world, and the wholesale and considering, over and above all, that not one of the perpetrators has had any criminal penalty to pay, it would be strange if this distrust did not exist.

IT IS RARELY that anyone is actually committed for open contempt of court. In most cases in which a contempt has been committed, the Court is satisfied by the offender making a submission and paying costs. Vice-Chancellor Malins, however, this week committed two persons for gross and violent conduct to a solicitor's clerk, who served on one of them an interim order for an injunction. In an old case of Williams v. John, in 1773, a defendant was committed to the Fleet for a contempt which consisted in forcing a process-server to eat the wax and parchment of the subpoena, beating him till he became senseless, and then ordering his servants to throw him into the river.

THE NEW SYSTEM OF TAXATION.

On the 1st of January next a new system of payment and collection of the income tax, land tax, inhabited house duty, and other assessed taxes comes into operation. The Act by which this is effected is the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, and, as is the case with most other Acts relating to similar subjects, it is not very easy to understand its exact effect on first reading it, owing to the numerous references it contains to former Acts of Parliament. The subject will probably attract a good deal of attention in the next few weeks, and we observe that meetings have already been held in some quarters to protest against the payment of these taxes in advance. It may not, therefore, be out of place to give some explanation of the alterations effected by the Act.

As regards the income tax, land tax, and inhabited house duty, the alteration consists simply in altering the time of payment. For the future these taxes are to become due on the 1st of January, instead of being due by quarterly payments throughout a year, commencing from the 6th of April. Although, however, by law these taxes have been payable quarterly, the practice with regard to their collection has varied much in different places; we believe they have most frequently been collected in half-yearly payments, while in some places they have been collected only annually in one sum. Thus the new law will no doubt practically affect tax payers in different localities somewhat differently. It has, in fact, seldom been found worth while to demand, and probably never to enforce, punctual payment of the earliest instalments, owing to the trouble and expense of such a proceeding. Therefore, notwithstanding that, as was pointed out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the time of payment is now, in comparison with the proper dates for the payment of the four instalments, more retarded on the whole than advanced, there can be no doubt that the practical effect in most places will be to advance the time when payment is likely to be enforced.

In the end, however, when the new system has come fully into operation, no more and no less will have been paid in respect of these taxes by the tax-payers than they would have paid under the old system. They will only be out of pocket by a small amount in respect of interest upon the duty for a short space of time, in those cases where it has not hitherto been the practice to enforce punctual payment of the earlier instalments. The prin-capital difference, therefore, to the tax-payers will be that they will always have to pay in one sum at the same time of the year, while, to the State, the difference will be in the saving of expense of collection. To assist those who may wish to verify these conclusions by reference to the Act of Parliament, it may, perhaps, be as well to point out that the 5th, 6th, and 7th sections, which, to a casual reader, might appear to contain elaborate alterations of the law with reference to these taxes, are really similar to the provisions which, for some time past, have been contained in the annual income-tax Acts.

The alterations with regard to what are ordinarily known as the assessed taxes, that is, the taxes on male servants, horses and carriages, and armorial bearings, and also that on horse-dealers, are much more elaborate, and difficult to understand. This is so both as regards the alterations in the payments required from tax-payers, and also as regards the alterations in the machinery under which those payments are to be made. The amounts of the various duties are somewhat altered, and, on the whole, reduced. So far greater simplicity is certainly introduced, but besides this, as our readers are all aware, these taxes are now to be paid in January in advance for articles kept or used in the ensuing year, instead of being, as heretofore, payable by four instalments (on the 20th of June, September, December, and March), in respect of articles kept during the year ending on the 5th of April preceding. In practice these taxes have, of late years, scarcely ever been collected in the four instalments; still they have been by law so payable ever since the passing of the Act 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, in 1803. It will be seen therefore, that the time by which the payment of these taxes is anticipated will vary a good deal in different cases, but it may be calculated roughly at a year. Thus, the payers of this tax will mostly be out of pocket through the alteration by about a year's interest on the amount of the tax paid by them. There is, however, to be no assessment made in respect of articles kept during the period between the 6th of April, 1869, and the 1st of January, 1870, and the effect of this is very important. Thus, it might appear at first sight that, by the alteration from post payment to payment in advance, an additional year's taxes would eventually be paid by each tax-payer. The effect, however, in all cases which it is at all reasonable to contemplate will, owing to the provisions to which we have referred, be more nearly the contrary. Of course, if any sudden convulsion, either of nature or of society, were to put an end to the payment of these taxes, each tax-payer would have paid more under the new system than he would if the old had been continued. In the rather more likely case of the taxes being repealed no one could, of course, complain of his having had to pay in advance, because if he had not, probably the repeal would have been a year later.

Let us take, however, the cases which must happen if the order of things contemplated and provided for by the new statute continues for a few years, and see whether a tax-payer ceasing, after the commencement of the new system, to keep the article for which he has been taxed will, after paying all to which he has become liable in respect of it, on the whole have paid more or less in consequence of the alteration. It will be found that a person who may hereafter discontinue to keep, say a horse, upon which, before the alteration, he has been liable to the assessed tax—that is to say, a horse which he kept prior to the 5th of April, 1869, will, if the date of his ceasing to keep it lies between the 1st of January and the 5th of April in any year, have to pay exactly the same number of yearly assessments in respect of his horse, as he would have done under the old system, while if he discontinues it between the 6th of April and the 31st of December, in any year, he will have to pay one year's assessment less than he would have been liable to under the old system. This, of course, is owing to the year dating from the 1st of January instead of from the 6th of April preceding, so that although he would, by keeping the horse after the 6th of April in any year, have broken into a new year under the old system, he does not do so under the new, unless he keeps it on beyond the next 1st of January. Thus, as the period after the 5th of April, in any year, is about three times as long as that before that day, any present tax-payer may calculate that the time when he will cease to become liable to pay assessed taxes (as he must some time by death, if not otherwise) is three times as likely to fall in the latter nine months of the year as in the first three; and, therefore, that there is a probability of three to one that he, or at all events his executors or administrators, will eventually save a year's assessment to the assessed taxes by the alteration effected in the present year. The tax-payers have, therefore, this eventual advantage to look forward to, in addition to the present benefit of a reduction of several of the duties, as some compensation for the pressure put upon them now in having to pay in advance duties for next year, before the payment of the duties for the past year is entirely cleared off.

It is not, however, to be inferred that because about three-fourths of the present tax-payers will eventually pay one assessment the less, owing to the present alteration, that therefore the State must eventually lose that amount. In the first place, there is the consideration, that what the tax-payers now gain by the law they often before gained by evading the law. It was frequently impossible to get the duty on articles eighteen months or two years after they had been given up by the person keeping them, nor was this evasion necessarily a dishonest one, as it might well have been unintentional, and on the part of executors it must have commonly been so. Then again, even supposing that the duty hitherto had been as completely collected under the old system as it will be under the new, still the State now receives the taxes in advance, and new tax-payers will come in before they otherwise would do so to pay in place of the old ones who discontinue; so that the loss of three-fourths of a year's taxes will not fall on the State until a year after horses and carriages and the other articles cease to be the subjects of assessed taxes. The only effect, therefore, would be that the alteration may have postponed for one year the eventual repeal of these taxes—a contingency which we should imagine is very remote, now that the duties are reduced to a very simple form, and imposed only on luxuries. If, however, the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the increased amount that will be collected, and the saving that will be effected in the expense of collection, are anything like verified, the profit to the State will be very much greater than the present value of the ultimate loss on the amounts due from each individual tax-payer, to which we have referred.

On the whole, therefore, we must give the scheme as to the assessed taxes our decided approval, believing that its advantages far outweigh the grievance caused by the present pressure of several payments at once. It is, however, a matter of some doubt whether, although it is desirable to have only one collection of each tax in the year, it is also desirable to have that collection at the same time for all taxes. Not only does it put additional pressure upon the public to do so, but also we should imagine it must require an additional staff. If the assessed taxes and some others were collected in January, and the income-tax in July, we should imagine that the services of the same officer would be available for their collection to a greater extent than they will be under the proposed arrangement.

We pass on now to the consideration of the alterations in the machinery for collection of the assessed taxes, and the manner in which tax-payers will be affected by these alterations. At present the machinery in use is that provided by 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, for although the duties have been frequently altered since then, and are now totally different, yet as regards the notices to be served, the returns to be made, and the penalties which may be incurred, no substantial alteration appears to have been made until the present year. By the 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, s. 25, it is provided that the assessors shall place certain notices on the church doors as to the taxes to be paid and as to the liability of persons to make returns. And it is enacted that this shall be a sufficient notice to all persons, but by the 26th section it is also provided that the assessors, besides those general notices, "shall" leave at every dwelling-house, where any person liable, or supposed to be liable, to the duties resides a notice for the occupier, and in certain cases other notices. Under this last section forms have been regularly supplied to persons liable, on which to make their returns, and although the omission of the officer to deliver such a notice and form would not have excused in law the omission to make a return, yet there can be no doubt that in practice it would have been a sufficient excuse, and no penalty would have been enforced. Under the Act of this session, section 20, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are to cause notices to be posted on the 1st of January, on all church doors, stating the duties payable, and where persons liable may procure forms on which to make their declarations. By section 24 the Commissioners "may" also serve special notices on individuals, and deliver to them forms, which in that case they are bound to fill up within fourteen days. It will be observed that "shall" in the old Act is changed to "may" in the new one. The importance of this of course depends entirely upon the practice which the Commissioners choose to adopt. It is probable, however, that they will cause notices to be served as hitherto. If they were not to do so, but were to enforce the penalties on all who did not obey the notices on the church doors, there certainly would be loud complaints, and not without reason. Having, however, procured a form, either from having it left at his dwelling, or by going to fetch it from the person to whom he is directed by notice on the church doors, every person liable to duty is before the end of January to fill up the form and state the number of male servants, horses, etc., then kept by him, and then to deliver it to the proper officer and pay the duty according to the number so returned. If, afterwards, during the year, he begins to keep an additional male servant, etc., or if he begins to keep any subjects of the duty for the first time in any other month in the year, he is to go and make a similar return, and pay the duty within twenty-one days from his so beginning to keep them. If he fails in any of these duties he is liable to pay a penalty of £20. Under the old Act a penalty of £50 was incurred by not making a proper return, and it was also provided, by section 29, that a person either commencing or ceasing to keep any subject of the duty should give notice to the assessors within twenty-one days. There was no penalty, however, attached to the not giving such notice, except the liability to be charged for subjects the keeping of which had been discontinued; and as, of course, the only use of the notice of beginning to keep the articles was to check the return which the person would have to make in the ensuing year, and no payment had immediately to be made upon them as is the case now. Such notices were in fact never given. The obligation to give the notice of keeping an additional horse or male servant, or of having purchased a ring with a crest engraved on it, and to pay the duty within twenty-one days of its being first incurred, which is now imposed under a somewhat severe penalty, is undoubtedly a new one. There is also another somewhat important omission from the provisions of the old Act. Under that, if a person had neglected to make a return, or had omitted any article from his return, he could not be prosecuted for the penalty, if he had been surcharged and paid the duty. There is no substitute for this. On the contrary, the law is made the same as it is with the dog licences under the Act of 1867. If the tax-collector suspects a person of keeping some article for which he has not a licence, he may go to him, persuade him to take out a licence, take his money, give him the licence, and then, by the help of the admission he has obtained, prosecute him for not having had the licence before. In such a case neither ignorance nor forgetfulness would be an excuse under the present statute, but the penalty of £20 would have been incurred. We have known such a case occur under the Act relating to dog licences. It is evident, therefore, that the public are somewhat at the mercy of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and their officers. It is to be hoped that these powers will be used with discretion and justice: if they should not be, either in the particulars we have alluded to, and in some others, the Commissioners can, as it appears to us, only be controlled by the force of public opinion, the provisions in favour of the tax-payers appearing to be discretionary, while those against them are imperative.

It remains only to point out how the penalties are to be recovered, and—what is, perhaps, of more practical importance—how far the penalties may be mitigated. They are by section 18 to be governed by the law relating to excise penalties. The enactments as to these are principally contained in 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, which gave a jurisdiction within the limits of the chief office of excise in London to the Commissioners of Excise, and in all other cases to two magistrates. The proceeding in either case is by information. By the Act referred to an appeal lay from the Commissioners of Excise to certain commissioners of appeal, but by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 20, the appeal was transferred to the Barons of the Exchequer. By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 1, the Boards of Excise and of Stamps and Taxes were consolidated, and thereby the powers of the Commissioners of Excise were conferred within the limits of the chief office of Inland Revenue in London upon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. Finally, by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 61, a concurrent jurisdiction with the Commissioners within those limits was given to the metropolitan police magistrates. As the law stands, therefore, these penalties may be enforced upon information in London either before the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, with an appeal to the Barons of the Exchequer, or before a police magistrate, with an appeal to the Quarter Sessions; and in the country before two justices of the peace, with an appeal to Quarter Sessions. Hitherto the recovery of penalties in relation to assessed taxes has been governed by 43 Geo. 4, c. 99; the larger penalties being recoverable only by action or information at the suit of the Attorney-General, while others were recovered before commissioners, from whom an appeal lay to the Barons of the Exchequer on questions of surcharge, but on questions of surcharge only. With regard to the mitigation of the penalty the justices before whom a case is heard, or the Court of Quarter Sessions on appeal from them, may remit three-fourths of the penalty (by 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 78), and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may remit the whole. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue may also, by section 98, stay any prosecution for a penalty, and, by section 99, the Commissioners of the Treasury may also remit any penalty or mitigate it. It follows, therefore, that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have ample powers to prevent any injustice being done, through mistakes caused by ignorance of the new system, and we trust that these will be exercised if occasion requires it.

COSTS OF APPEARANCE WHERE THE PARTY HAS NO INTEREST.

There are many points of procedure, small in themselves, but capable of giving rise to much inconvenience if the practice be not uniform and well understood. In such cases it may be a matter of real indifference what the practice is to be, so long as there is a uniform settled practice in all branches of the court. Some time ago (12 Sol. Jour. 628) we had occasion to notice a point of this kind in the question when a stop order should be applied for by petition, and when by summons in chambers; and we then disapproved of the conclusion of Vice-Chancellor Malins in Wrench v. Wynne (17 W. R. 198), not so much on its merits as from its disturbing, for no sufficient reason, what had long been accepted as a settled rule for the guidance of suitors.

The question whether or no a person unnecessarily served with a petition or notice of motion, or a person rightly served but proving to have no interest, is entitled to his costs of appearance, may seem a small and unimportant one; and yet if on such a point there be no uniform rule, the doubt will necessarily cause a constant and vexatious inconvenience.

The point, too, is not without some reason as against a practice upon it which seems to have been adopted in one of our Chancery courts; and as there seems at present to be some difference in the various courts, we shall not be engrossing the practitioner's attention to no purpose if we detail the authorities.

In Templeman v. Warrington (3 Dec. 1819) (1 J. & W. 377n.), "the Master of the Rolls (Sir Thomas Plumer) refused costs to a party who appeared on a petition, following what his Honour understood from the registrars to have been the practice of the late Master of the Rolls" (Sir William Grant).

But in Heneage v. Aikin (May 1820) (1 J. & W. 377), a party served with a notice of motion and having no interest, appearing and asking for costs, and it being mentioned that there was a difference in the practice, the Master of the Rolls being in the habit of refusing the costs in such cases, Lord Eldon said:—

"If you serve the party with notice of motion, you cannot object to his appearing. Is he not entitled to be indemnified for the expense occasioned by his prudence in appearing in consequence of your notice?"

Again, in Garey v. Whittingham (1823), (T. & R. 405), Sir Thomas Plumer refused costs to a party without interest, who, on being served had appeared on a petition, saying—

"The rule is not of my making; when I first came to this seat I thought the point of so much importance that I consulted Sir Wm. Grant upon it; he informed me that in his time the rule was as I have stated"—(viz., not to give the costs); "a contrary practice would put the public to enormous and unnecessary expense."

In Crawshaw v. Thornton (1837), (2 My. & Cr. 24), Lord Cottenham stated it to be now the settled practice of the Court, that when a petition was served upon unnecessary parties who appeared, they were entitled to their costs. He distinguished the case of a petition of appeal, and refused costs of appearance to a non-demurring defendant who had been served with a petition of appeal presented by another whose demurrer had been overruled by the Vice-Chancellor.

In Bamford v. Watts (1839), (2 Beav. 202), Lord Langdale, M.R., stated that since the time of Sir Thomas Plumer his practice had been abandoned, it being considered "That where a party is served with a petition or notice of motion, he is not bound to take upon himself the responsibility of deciding whether his interest in the matter is such as to render it unnecessary for him to appear; instances had occurred where parties had been greatly prejudiced by their solicitors taking upon themselves that responsibility."

To the same effect are Bruce v. Kinlock (Lord Langdale, 1849), (11 Beav. 432), and Rowley v. Adams (Lord Romilly, 1852), (16 Beav. 312). The report of Major v. Major (1849), (11 Jur. 1), represents Lord Cottenham as there acting on a rule identical with Sir Thomas Plumer's, but, in Bruce v. Kinlock, Lord Langdale said he had ascertained from Lord Cottenham that he decided nothing of the kind.

In Tabuteau v. Warburton (Sugden. L. C. Ir. 1843), (4 Dr. & W. 267), the present Lord St. Leonards allowed the costs, observing that the party was not bound to take on himself the responsibility of deciding whether his interest was such as to render it unnecessary for him to appear.

It seems, therefore, to have become a settled rule to allow the costs. Since the increase in the number of Chancery judges there has been some uncertainty.

In Re The Justices of Coventry, (1854), (3 W. R. 141, 19 Beav. 160), on a petition for payment out of court, Lord Romilly said:—

"It is clear that — have nothing to do with the matter. It is true, indeed, that the form of the account rendered it necessary to serve them, but there was no necessity for their appearing, and they are not entitled to their costs of appearance."

But, in Re Copyhold Commissioners, Ex parte Queen's College, Oxford (1857), (6 W. R. 9), where a fund was invested in the names of the Commissioners, who, however, had no interest, Vice-Chancellor Stuart said, upon their being served they must refer it to their solicitor to advise them whether the proposed mode of dealing was proper. Who was to pay them their costs so incurred, and how were they to get them unless they appeared and asked for them? The Vice-Chancellor also distinguished between a petition in a matter and a petition in a cause, because, in the latter case, each party has a solicitor in the cause. We do not, however, think that there is anything in this distinction. For instance, it may be necessary (as upon a sale in an administration suit) to serve a person who has no solicitor in the cause: the question, too, as Lord Cottenham and others above cited have put it, is, whether or not the party served is to consult his solicitor at his own expense.

The case of Re Hertford Charity (Lord St. Leonards, 1852), (19 Beav. 518n.), is vague, as it does not appear, from the notice of the case, whether or not the party whose costs were refused had been served. Another case of Day v. Croft (1854), (19 Beav. 518)—which Vice-Chancellor Wood is said to have reluctantly followed in a case which will presently be mentioned—decides still less. The report states that a petition in an administration suit, for exchange and inclosure of lands, had been served on residuary legatees who had no interest; they did not appear on the petition, but, on drawing up the order, asked for their costs. The report says that Lord Romilly refused their costs, and was confirmed in so doing by the Lords Justices. It is generally understood that a party served, by not appearing, waives his costs, so that this case is hardly an authority in point.

In Barton v. Latour (Lord Romilly), (18 Beav. 526), a purchaser had paid his purchase-money into court, and afterwards got his conveyance, having been served with, and appeared on, a petition for payment out of court. Lord Romilly said:—

"When a purchaser has not obtained a conveyance the fund in which he has an interest cannot be dealt with in his absence; but when he has got his conveyance he, no longer having any interest, should not appear, but should inform the petitioner that he has no claim on the fund. I can give the purchaser no costs."*

In Re Birch's Will (1856), (2 K. & J. 369), the assignees of an insolvent had petitioned for and obtained payment out of court of a legacy to which he had been entitled. He had been served with the petition, in consequence of an affidavit made by the trustees that he "was, or claimed to be, entitled by reason of his certificate." Vice-Chancellor Wood observed that this was clearly a groundless claim. His Honour said he should follow Day v. Croft, and Re Hertford Charity (ubi sup.), with some reluctance, as he had thought the reason assigned for the former practice a good one—viz., that the respondent ought to be repaid the expense which he had been put to by being unnecessarily served.

In Ex parte Churchill, Re Griffiths (1862), (1 N. R. 140), some creditors supported and some opposed a petition to discharge an order made by a registrar in bankruptcy. The official assignee appeared, consenting to the prayer. Lord Westbury said that when the official assignee had no other duty to discharge than to say that he consented, it would be sufficient if he communicated his consent to the petitioner; he need not appear, and his costs would not be allowed.

* As to the costs of purchasers of estates sold in suits, where the purchase-money has been paid into court, Lord Romilly stated in Noble v. Stow (1861), (30 Beav. 273) that he considered the practice to be either to draw up the order for payment out, with the purchaser's consent, in which case he was entitled to his costs of appearance, or to draw it up on proper evidence that he had been served with notice, and had got his conveyance, in which case, according to Barton v. Latour (supra), he would not be entitled to his costs of appearance.

Then, in Haynes v. Barton (1866), (14 W. R. 257), Vice-Chancellor Kindersley said:—

"I hold that in every case where a petition is presented, a party served with that petition is entitled to appear and have his costs. Is a man who is served with a petition to consult his solicitor, and appear or not, at his own risk and expense? Most certainly not."

In a case of Re O'Neil (March 23, 1866), (unreported), in which a petition in lunacy, relative to the personal estate of a deceased lunatic, contained some unnecessary statements concerning realty and the heir-at-law, the Lords Justices directed the petition to be amended by striking out those statements; but they gave the heir, who had been served, his costs.

Finally, Vice-Chancellor Malins has recently announced that he shall adhere to the practice of giving the costs. In Clark v. Simpson (1868), (L. R. 6 Eq. 337), his Honour said:—

"Whatever may be the practice in other branches of the court it has always been my practice, and I shall continue to act upon it until I find it otherwise decided by higher authority, to allow a person who is served with a petition, and at the hearing claims no interest, his costs of appearance; I do not see why a person who is served is to judge whether or not he is necessarily served."

He then allowed ten guineas for costs.

Vice-Chancellor James has adopted the following rule, Re Duggan's Trusts (1869), (L. R. 8 Eq. 698):—

"If a petitioner, when he serves a petition, at the same offers the respondent forty shillings in order to enable him to get the advice of his solicitor as to whether he shall appear or not, and the respondent after that appears, the Court will consider whether such appearance be justified or not, and if it finds that it is not justified, will not order the petitioner to pay the costs of the respondent's appearance; otherwise it will."

At present, then, Vice-Chancellor Stuart allows the costs; Vice-Chancellor Malins, ditto; Vice-Chancellor James holds that a previous tender of forty shillings is sufficient; and the Master of the Rolls refuses the costs. We can conceive of no answer to the observation made by several judges, that the party served ought to be reimbursed the expense of advice as to whether he should appear or no; he certainly ought to have some costs; whether it be on Vice-Chancellor Malins' scale or that of Vice-Chancellor James is a comparatively unimportant matter, but it is important that some uniform rule should be adopted in all the four courts, and we heartily wish that the Master of the Rolls and the three Vice-Chancellors would agree on one.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

BILL TO RECOVER FOR BREACH OF DUTY.

Overend, Gurney, & Co. (Limited) v. Gurney & Others.
17 W. R. 1115.

If a shareholder can prove that the misrepresentation of the company induced him to become one, he is entitled to get himself removed from the register, either by motion or bill, provided, of course, that he begins before the company gets into liquidation. Further than this, if he can fix the directors with a scienter—with a guilty knowledge of the misrepresentation they made or sanctioned—he has a personal remedy in equity against them, and may, as in Henderson v. Lacon (16 W. R. 328), obtain a decree against them for repayment and costs. We imagine, however, that this personal relief against the directors could only be obtained as supplemental to a prayer for removal from the register; and that, if the company has already commenced winding-up, so that the duped shareholder is fixed as a contributory, he cannot succeed on a bill filed against the directors for indemnity and reimbursement, but must bring his action at common law.

In the present case the frame of the suit was very remarkable. The bill was filed by a company in liquidation against its directors, some of whom had been partners in a firm, whose business the company had been formed to buy and carry on. The proceedings in Oakes v. Turquand (15 W. R. 1201), have familiarized everyone with the word "misrepresentation" in connection with Overend, Gurney, & Co. (Limited); it is therefore especially necessary to observe that the present bill expressly disclaimed imputing fraud, and was not grounded in misrepresentation; but it alleged breach of duty and gross negligence in the manner in which the defendants had conducted the purchase of the business of the firm of Overend, Gurney, & Co., alleged that if the condition of that firm had been laid before a meeting of the company they never would have consented to buy its business, and claimed that the defendants ought to reimburse the company for the loss sustained by this undoubtedly bad bargain. Lord Hatherley laid down in limine a distinction which is acute and incontrovertible; that the relief, if the plaintiffs were entitled to any, could only go to the extent of the funds entrusted to the directors to make the purchase with (some £250,000), and not to all the subsequent liabilities entailed by the transaction. The relief prayed could be awarded only as for a breach of duty regarded as a breach of trust, and a trust implies a particular subject-matter to which the trust extends. As to the further loss—that is, the amount the company had had to pay over and above their purchase-moneys,—the remedy, if any, was only at common law.

A bill for breach of duty, such as this, is, so far as the reports are concerned, without precedent; but the plaintiffs relied on an old case of The Charitable Corporation v. Sutton (1 Atk. 400), decided by Lord Hardwicke in 1742. The Charitable Corporation was, in point of fact, meant to be a benevolent pawnbroking society, intended to assist poor persons with loans on pledge. The committee-men did not keep up a certain system of checks on the officers of the society, and did not properly inspect cash balances or take stock of pledges, and, by these and other laxities, they afforded to certain of the company's officers powers which they abused by fraudulently lending the society's funds to themselves and others upon grossly-inadequate security. For this Lord Hardwicke decreed the committee-men to make good the loss, and ordered, moreover, the representatives of a deceased committee-man to be "examined as to the hand his principal had in the affair." It was contended that this decision had not been approved subsequently; the real fact is, that an analogous case has never arisen, and so the decision has scarcely ever been cited.

Vice-Chancellor Malins overruled a demurrer for want of equity, on the ground that he approved, and could not distinguish Charitable Corporation v. Sutton. And, indeed, we can see no reason for doubting the soundness of Lord Hardwicke's decision. Lord Hatherley, however, decided nothing as to this, but reversed the Vice-Chancellor on the facts. Considering that the company was formed to buy this very business, a business which was in its nature of a speculative character, he did not consider that the directors, having had a wide discretion entrusted to them, had been guilty of negligence amounting to a breach of trust. The gist of the decision is, that merely making a bad or imprudent bargain cannot be dealt with as a breach of trust on the part of directors; but there are dicta in the judgment respecting the duty of directors in such cases, which were unnecessary and in our humble opinion injudicious, as calculated to convey the idea that the judge went farther than he actually did go, in favour of the directors' position.

There is one other remark in the judgment which, though only a dictum, we must notice because it appears to us inaccurate. Speaking of the claim for indemnity ultra the £250,000, as one enforceable, if at all, only at law, Lord Hatherley says the consequence would be that the representatives of the deceased director could not be pursued either at law or in equity; certainly not in equity, for the tort would be personal. We think this dictum illustrates the small value of obiter dicta. No doubt if, in such a case, the party aggrieved chose to sue, in tort, the remedy would not survive against representatives. But we apprehend that, in such a case, the action would lie either in tort or contract, and that, if framed on the latter, it would be maintainable as against representatives.

OF THE RIGHT TO INTEREST IN CERTAIN CASES.

Re Kerr's Policy, V.C.J., 17 W. R. 989, L. R. 8 Eq. 331.

In deciding that an equitable mortgagee, who takes a security by deposit of title-deeds without written memorandum or stipulation as to interest of any kind, is entitled to 4 per cent. interest on his debt, the Vice-Chancellor followed a decision of the Right Hon. T. B. C. Smith, when Master of the Rolls in Ireland, in a similar case, where, however, the interest given was after the rate of 5 per cent. instead of 4.

In the case we refer to, Carey v. Doyle (5 Ir. Ch. Rep. 104), it was held that where deeds are deposited, by way of equitable mortgage, to secure a simple contract debt, the debt bears interest from the date of the deposit, and by reason of it, though there be no express contract that the debt shall bear interest.

These decisions appear, at first sight, to run counter to the common theory as to the payment of interest, which being, as the common count runs, for the forbearance of money due from A. to B., interest ought not to be claimed until demand, in the absence of express stipulation. Lord Eldon's views on this subject, as expressed by him in Ex parte Haigh, will be found in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland in Carey v. Doyle. Ex parte Haigh, be it observed, as reported in 11 Ves. 43, contains no more than a denunciation by Lord Eldon of the rule that an equitable charge may be created by the mere deposit of title-deeds without any memorandum in writing, the Statute of Frauds notwithstanding. It is said in the Anonymous case (4 Taunt. 876) that interest was given on affirmance of a judgment upon an agreement to execute a mortgage, where it may be presumed that the agreement was silent as to interest. It is not stated what rate of interest was given. But in Ashton v. Dalton (2 Coll. 565) Sir J. L. Knight-Bruce, V.C., his Honour doubted whether the mere deposit of deeds without legal security would make a debt bear interest that was not of its nature interest-bearing. It was not, however, necessary to decide the point.

We may now regard the principle as settled, and the reason of it is simply this—that the imperfect form of mortgage created by the deposit of deeds without a written memorandum is capable of being perfected at the suit of the mortgagee. The deposit of title-deeds to secure a loan is to be regarded in equity as an agreement to execute a mortgage of the property comprised in the deed, with interest. This is the true view of a transaction which is now of every-day occurrence, and as to which it is now too late for anyone to lament, with Lord Eldon, that the provisions of the Statute of Frauds are evaded by a security being created without writing.

THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.—According to Bishop Burnett, we are indebted to a “jest” for this highly-prized palladium of English liberty. To quote the bishop's words, he says:—“It was carried by an odd artifice in the House of Lords. Lord Grey and Lord Norris were named to be the tellers. Lord Norris, being a man subject to vapours, was not at all times attentive to what he was doing; so a very fat lord coming in, Lord Grey counted him for ten, as a jest at first, but seeing Lord Norris had not observed it, he went on with this mis-reckoning of ten, so that it was reported to the House, and declared that they who were for the bill were the majority, though it indeed went on the other side, and by this means the bill passed.”

REVIEWS.

The Law of Limitation as to Real Property, including that of the Crown and the Duke of Cornwall. By WILLIAM BROWN, Barrister-at-Law. London: H. Sweet. 1869.

This book contains more than its title would lead the reader to expect. It deals not only with the Statutes of Limitation, properly so-called, but also with the Prescription Acts; and not content even with this wide field of labour the author introduces his subject with a long historical dissertation on the law of prescription in general. We must not be understood, however, as in any way blaming him for the course he has taken. On the contrary, he has greatly increased the value by increasing the bulk of his work. Mr. Brown will, we are sure, appreciate the high compliment we pay him, when we say that his method may be compared, and not unfavourably, with that of the late Mr. Best, in his celebrated treatise on the Law of Evidence. We find here the same mixture, which exists there, of principles and practice. The result will probably be that Mr. Brown's book will be found in the hands of students and jurists as well as in those of practising lawyers.

The difference between prescription and limitation has been frequently discussed, and is well described by the late Professor Bell in his treatise on Scotch Law. Limitation, he says, denies the remedy after the lapse of a certain time; prescription extinguishes the claim itself. Generally speaking this distinction is well founded, and may be illustrated by the fact that whilst a debt barred by the statute is nevertheless a debt still, and may furnish a good consideration for a subsequent promise to pay it, the non-exercise of a right by one man may give to another an absolute power of vetoing its exercise on any future occasion. But prescription and limitation are sufficiently allied to make it convenient to treat them together. Indeed, the latter, which is statute law, followed almost as a corollary on the existence of the former, and both are based upon the necessities of a highly civilized society. Nor, is there anything, as is often supposed, morally dishonest in a suitor availing himself of the law of prescription or limitation by way of defence. Mr. Brown in his section on the “object” of the law (pp. 7—23) has collected a number of judicial dicta on the subject. Pleading the Statute of Limitations, said Lord Holt in his trenchant way, is no disparagement to any body: and to the same effect Mr. Brown cites the opinions of such men as Garrow, Chief Justice Best, Chief Baron Richards, Lord Brougham, and Lord Cranworth. He might have added the names of many living judges, had he pleased, to his list, though, indeed, the policy of some law of peace is too obvious to want the support of great names. In the language of the old maxim “interest reipublice ut sit finis litium.”

The first portion of Mr. Brown's work is occupied with prescription (pp. 1—234), and the second with limitation (pp. 234—735), but the two subjects are treated in a very different manner. The latter, or “prescription by legislative enactment,” does not furnish the same field for historical or juridical discussion as the former, and Mr. Brown could do no more than he has done, could do no more than give in a convenient and classified form the provisions of the various enactments and the decisions upon them. The two principal statutes are, we need hardly say, the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), and what is called par excellence “the Statute of Limitation” (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), with regard to which it may be noted, in passing, that contrary to the usual policy of such statutes it bars the right as well as the remedy. In Mr. Brown's pages the reader will find a full and elaborate commentary on both these Acts of Parliament, together with others subsidiary to them. Commencing with an account of “the territorial operation of the laws, the subject of this book” (pp. 234—239), the writer proceeds to consider, 1st, the persons (pp. 239—315), and 2ndly, the things (pp. 316—407), affected by them. Then follow chapters (pp. 407—565) on the period of limitation and the circumstances under which it may be shortened, suspended, or extended. Next, the operation of the statutes on the expiration of the period of limitation is detailed and the effect of acknowledgment described (pp. 566—671). Two short chapters, one on interpretation (pp. 672—728) and the other on the effect of the statutes on questions between vendor and purchaser, conclude this division of the volume.

It remains to say a few words on the earlier part of Mr. Brown's labour. He has introduced his subject with an historical sketch of prescription in general and "possession," (pp. 1—134) in the technical sense of detention of property with the intention to keep it. He then proceeds to prescription proper (pp. 134—234), and "custom," as distinguished from prescription, topics which fill the interval between the introductory, and what we may call the main portion of the book. In this connection a great deal of valuable information is given respecting fisheries, and here as elsewhere the reader finds frequent reference to Irish, Scotch, and American, as well as to English cases. Indeed, in this wealth of reference to foreign authorities, Mr. Brown has struck out a path not often followed by English text-book writers, the vision of most of whom is bounded by the reports of domestic courts. Mr. Brown's comprehensive industry has resulted in the production of a manual of more than ordinary completeness. We should add, in conclusion, that the work is supplied with an appendix, containing in full the principal statutes commented on, and also with an ample index.

Commentaries on the History of the City of London. By GEORGE NORTON. 3rd Ed. Revised. Longmans. 1869.

The history of the City of London is in no small degree the history of England. Although London does not occupy in England the same political position and importance as Paris occupies in France, it is still emphatically the capital city of Great Britain; more than that, it is the chief city in the world, if population and wealth be taken as the criterion of municipal importance. A metropolitan insurrection against the constituted authorities, if such an event were possible, would no doubt produce little or no effect in the provinces. The principles of local self-government are too strongly planted among us to admit of Liverpool or Bristol, for example, following the lead of London, simply for the reason that London happened to be the metropolis. Even the humblest provincial town would have been ashamed to emulate the serio-comic excesses of the Hyde-park rioters. London never has given, and it would seem, never seems destined to give the mot d'ordre to any great popular movement. In truth the energies of its vast population are too diverse to be intense. Petty or local causes are incapable of moving its emotion. Coventry may be agitated about the French Treaty, Manchester may be agitated about the prospects of a cotton supply, Lincolnshire about the protection which we are told on high authority fertilised its broad acres; London is to large for these isolated and merely local interests. It is pre-eminently metropolitan. We may smile, if we please, at the clumsy and antiquated pageantry of the civil authorities; but the fact remains that, in spite of superficial defects, there is nothing really mean or despicable about the past traditions or present position of the City of London.

The annals of so ancient and famous a corporation are sure to be well worth preserving, and we are glad, therefore, to welcome a new edition of Norton's Commentaries. And the corporation to whose public spirit we mainly owe the reprint deserve our thanks. The qualifications of the author are beyond dispute. At one time he occupied an official position in the City, as one of its common pleaders, which imposed upon him the necessary duty of learning something of its laws and customs. He did well in revealing to the general public the result of his investigations. The first and second editions of his book are long since out of print, but with the encouragement of the corporation, this third and revised edition has recently been issued. Everybody born within the sound of Bow bells has thus had placed within his reach some account of the famous old city to which he belongs.

The book is divided into two parts. The first gives an historical account of the City of London, from its foundation under the Romans down to the Reform Act of 1832. It appears to have attained, whilst the Roman legions still remained in the island, to a considerable degree of opulence and grandeur, but upon their retirement, it rapidly declined and shared the stormy vicissitudes which accompanied the contests for supremacy between the Saxons and Danes. Before long, however, it re-asserted its old importance, and at the hands of Alfred the Great "the true founder of the municipal laws and privileges of London" received the most prominent of those free customs and privileges as well as that peculiar internal polity which have always distinguished the city from the rest of the nation. The Norman conqueror, therefore, found London already the chief place in the island, and the citizens proved powerful enough to assert their exemption from the numerous burdens which accompanied the introduction of the feudal system. By the first charter of William, the King made known to "William the Bishop, and Godfrey the Portreve, and all the burghers" that it was his sovereign will they should be "law-worthy as in the days of King Edward," and law-worthy they have ever been since. Successive monarchs confirmed and extended the ancient municipal privileges and customs, and few indeed were the occasions on which these were interfered with. In the reign of Charles II., the court lawyers levied the most formidable blow on record at the liberties of London. The charters of the city were declared to be forfeited; and a passing victory was then won over the sturdy Englishmen, whose immediate predecessors had borne witness during the great rebellion against the exercise of arbitrary power, and between whom and the Court there was naturally no great sympathy. But ere many years had passed James II., by the hand of Jeffreys, once Recorder of London, restored the charter to the citizens. It was on the eve of his flight, and too late to revive the vanished loyalty of the city. Scarcely had the King departed when the Court of Aldermen met and made a solemn declaration in favour of the Prince of Orange. A speedy reward followed. By the 2 & 3 W. & M. sess. 1, c. 8, the whole proceedings connected with the forfeiture of the charters by Charles II., were declared illegal, and the mayor, commonalty, and citizens were re-instated in all their ancient, civil, and political rights. They have never been seriously molested since, and upon the whole it must be admitted they have deserved their privileges. I ever "the rude hand of reforming Legislature" is laid upon them, their patriotism and determined adherence to popular principles will doubtless be remembered in their favour. In a new organization of this huge metropolis, the corporation of London will certainly hold its own. No one will complain if, in the recollection of its long and often illustrious history, Parliament should determine to "be to its faults a little blind; and to its virtues very kind."

We have only to add that in the second part of this treatise there is a list of the various charters granted from time to time to the City with an abstract of their contents and a full explanatory commentary. We are glad to be able to commend the book to the favourable notice of all our readers and especially to those of them who are citizens of London.

A Pocket Digest of Stamp Duties and of Judicial Decisions thereon, with directions on Stamped Instruments, and an Appendix of Stamp Acts, Tables of Duties, &c. By THOS. B. VACHER. London: Vacher & Sons. Sixth Edition, with Addenda. Showing the alterations effected by Acts passed in 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869.

The sixth edition of Messrs. Vacher's handy little book was published in 1865, since when many Acts have been passed, effecting alterations in the subject matter. Messrs. Vacher have accordingly reprinted their sixth edition, with an addendum comprising an alphabetical digest of the statutory alterations, and the list of the statutes by which they have been effected.

The work itself is a useful little companion; it contains complete information on all the stamps and duties with a digest of decisions; and a reprint with a digest of subsequent enactments is useful. It is, however, to be regretted that Messrs. Vacher did not while they were about it, post up their work in the new decisions as well as the new enactments. Since 1865 there have been many decisions of more or less importance, and to add the enactments and omit the decisions is only to half post up the work. We hope a fresh edition will be issued with the cases noted up. Another advantage of the book is that it is of a size to slip conveniently into the pocket.

THE LAW'S DELAYS.—The longest law suit of which we have any authentic record is one that lasted no less than a hundred and twenty years. It was between the heirs of Lord Lisle and the heirs of Lord Berkeley, respecting some property near Wotton-under-Edge, in the county of Gloucester. Having commenced in the reign of Edward IV., it was still pending in the commencement of the reign of James I., and was then only terminated by a compromise. Another chancery suit, commenced in 1749, and terminated in 1760, the amount in dispute being £2 2s. 1d. This was referred to arbitration, the referees decided that the plaintiff had no right to file his bill, and ordered him to pay a thousand guineas costs.

COURTS.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

Dec. 10.—Re W. R. and H. A. Gregg, Solicitors.

This was a motion on behalf of Messrs. Gregg, solicitors, of Kirkby Lonsdale, to discharge an attachment taken out to compel them to obey an order to tax their bill of costs which had been obtained in June last by Mr. Vaughan Prance, the solicitor on behalf of a Mr. Procter. The notice of motion sought to fix Mr. Vaughan Prance personally with the costs of the application.

Messrs. Gregg had been for many years, prior to June, 1869, the solicitors of Mr. Procter, an elderly gentleman of infirm health, whose affairs had been for the most part managed by his nephew, Mr. Gilbert Procter, under a power of attorney. There appeared to have been some contest in the family with reference to the management of the affairs of Mr. Procter, and the result was that in June last Mr. Gilbert Procter's power to act for his uncle was revoked, and Mr. Prance was substituted for Messrs. Gregg as the solicitor for Mr. Procter. Mr. Prance applied to Messrs. Gregg for his new client's papers and for their bill. They gave him no immediate answer, but sent to Mr. Gilbert Procter, whom they still treated as having authority to act for his uncle, their bill of costs, and a cheque for the balance due to Mr. Procter after deducting the amount of their bill, and a week afterwards wrote to Mr. Prance, simply stating that they had no money belonging to Mr. Procter in their hands, and that nothing was due to them. Mr. Prance thereupon obtained, on behalf of his client, the common order to tax Messrs. Gregg's bill of costs, to which Messrs. Gregg paid no attention, and an attachment consequently issued, to set aside which, on the ground of irregularity in several respects, was the object of the present motion.

Jessel, Q.C., Lopes Q.C., and M. Ingle Joyce, for Messrs. Gregg.

Rochburgh, Q.C., and J. T. Prior, for Mr. Prance.

Southgate, Q.C., and Freling, for Mr. Procter.

Lord ROMILLY, M.R., remarked on the fact of the notice of motion demanding that Mr. Prance might pay the costs of the application, and observed that in every reported case where the Court had made a solicitor pay the costs of such a proceeding he had been proved to be guilty of misconduct in the matter sought to be set aside. Mr. Prance was asked to pay the costs of setting aside the attachment, not because he had done anything fraudulent or wrong connected with the attachment, but because he, many years ago, and in other matters, was alleged to have misconducted himself. A more irregular application his Lordship never saw, and the motion, so far as it sought that Mr. Prance might personally be liable to pay the costs, must be dismissed with costs.

It was objected that the attachment was bad, because it was taken out after notice given by the Messrs. Gregg that they had no bill of costs, and no moneys of their client in their hands. But Messrs. Gregg ought to have inferred that Mr. Gilbert Procter had no longer authority to act for his uncle, and, at all events, they ought to have known that their bill was liable to be taxed, even though a special application might become necessary for the purpose. Messrs. Gregg had gone into a great deal of evidence, in order to justify the course they had taken by showing that Mr. Procter was incapable of managing his own affairs. But, even if this were true, it was not for them to become partisans, but they ought to have been ready at any time to hand over the papers and account to his proper representative. The delivery of the bill of costs to Mr. Gilbert Procter and the payment of the money to him did not exonerate them from the necessity of complying with the order. All the objections taken against the regularity of the attachment, in his opinion failed. He could not allow a solicitor to say, in resistance to the order to tax his bill that he had, since the bill and the papers were applied for, delivered both to another person, who under an instrument of older date had authority from the client to receive and settle the bill and the cash account—a fortiori when the solicitor was purposely told that the client had given authority to another person for both purposes. It would be for the taxing-master in the first instance, to determine whether the payment to Mr. Gilbert Procter of the balance due to his uncle was a good discharge to Messrs. Gregg under the circumstances, and as to that his Lordship would offer no opinion. The present application was both erroneous and improper—erroneous in bringing forward a series of frivolous objections to the attachment, and improper in making an attack on Mr. Prance's former life and conduct, wholly apart from the matter of the attachment. The motion, therefore, would be refused with costs; and on the applicants undertaking without prejudice to their right to appeal to deliver their bill of costs within ten days, proceedings under the attachment would be stayed until further order.

Sale of Land by Auction Act, 1867—Employment of puffer—Reserved price.

Land was offered for sale by auction, subject to a reserved price, but a right to bid was not reserved.

Held, that the employment of a person to bid on the seller's behalf vitiated the sale.

This was an adjourned summons. The facts were that an estate in Sussex was offered for sale by auction by Messrs. Norton, Trist, Watney, & Co., under an order of the Court, under conditions of sale, the second of which stated that the sale was subject to a reserved bidding, which had been fixed by the judge to whose court the cause was attached; but no right to bid was reserved on behalf of the sellers, who were trustees. The estate was knocked down to a Mr. Bridges for £29,000. Mr. Bridges afterwards discovered that a puffer had been employed on the seller's behalf, and, accordingly, took out the present summons to set aside the sale.

The Sales of Land by Auction Act, 1867, section 5, provides that the conditions of sale by auction of any land shall state whether such land will be sold without reserve, or subject to a reserved price, or whether a right to bid is reserved. "If it is stated that such land will be sold without reserve, or to that effect, then it shall not be lawful for the seller to employ any person to bid at such sale, or for the auctioneer to take knowingly any bidding from any such person."

It was in evidence that one puffer had been employed on behalf of the vendors, who bid upon himself, and made in all four biddings, but did not bid up to the reserved price.

Jessel, Q.C., and Whitehorn, in support of the summons.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and Langworthy, for the vendors, submitted that the employment of the puffer was immaterial, inasmuch as he did not bid up to the reserved price. Mortimer v. Bell, 14 W. R. 68, was referred to.

Lord ROMILLY, M.R.—The meaning of the Act is clear, that in every case of a sale of land by auction the vendor must state in the condition of sale whether there is a reserved price, and if he mean to employ a puffer, he must say that a right to bid is reserved. This has not been done in the present case; the sale must therefore be set aside, and the deposit returned, with interest at four per cent.

COUNTY COURTS.

MANCHESTER.

(Before J. A. RUSSELL, Q.C., Judge.)

Dec. 11.—The County Court and Imprisonment for D.b.

Mr. RUSSELL, on taking his seat in court, said he felt it his duty to make a statement respecting the granting of judgment summonses. As the law would, after the 1st of January, be materially altered on that subject, he thought it right to give public notice of the alteration, and at the same time to state the manner in which he intended to administer the law which would then come into force. The jurisdiction of that court upon judgment summonses had hitherto been exercised under the original County Court Act, amended by subsequent Acts. He believed that very considerable laxity had been allowed in the administration of the Act in question. Whether that laxity had gone beyond what the Legislature intended, or not, he was not prepared to say, and with regard to the policy of the Act, of course he made no observations. His business was to administer the law, and not to make any observations as to its policy. However, in his view, very great laxity had been allowed in the administration of the Act; but finding the system in force when he took his seat in that court as judge, he felt bound to administer the law as it had hitherto been administered. He endeavoured to some extent to modify it, but of course he could not, in justice to the suitors of that court, make any radical change. That radical change had, however, been made by the Legislature by the Debtors Act of 1869, which was passed last session, and which, as he had said, would come into force on the 1st January next. The provisions of this Act, so far as they related to the present subject, were these. [His Honour read the first part of section 5 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62.] Contrasting the language of that Act with the language of the original Act, he had come very strongly to the conclusion that whereas, under the original Act it might have been the intention of the Legislature that direct proof should not be required of the means of the debtor in order to entitle the judge to make an order for commitment, by the new Act such direct proof was required, and that made, according to his mind, a cardinal difference intended to be brought about by this statute in comparison with the one which was now in force, but which would expire at the end of the year. Having, after very mature consideration, come to that conclusion, he had felt it his duty to lay down certain rules for the guidance of suitors on this subject, which he would mention. He gave notice, therefore, that after the 1st of January no order or commitment would be made in that Court except under one or other of the three following circumstances:—

1st. Proof by the oath of some one who can speak of his own knowledge as to the defendant's means; or, 2nd, proof by the oath of some one who himself has made personal inquiry as to the defendant's means at the place where and of the person by whom the defendant is employed, or of his manager or book-keeper. 3rd. Or by the production on oath of books or documents showing what are the defendant's means.

Now, unless one or other of those conditions was complied with, he should in no case grant an order for commitment, for unless he acted upon those rules he should not, he believed, be interpreting the statute according to its effect, nor giving that protection to the defendant which the law, as laid down in the new statute, intended.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HENRY J. SUMNER MAINE, LL.D., late Legal Member of the Council of India, has been elected to fill the new Professorship of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford. Mr. Maine was educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1844. His academical career had been very distinguished, the following being a list of the various honours he carried off:—Chancellor's English Medal, 1842; Brown's Medal, Latin ode, 1842; Camden Medal, 1842; Craven University Scholarship, 1843; and Latin ode and epigram, 1843. He was a senior optime in the mathematical tripos of his year (the senior wrangler of the year being Mr. Hemming, now of the Chancery Bar), and was likewise senior classic and first Chancellor's Medalist. After his degree he became one of the tutors of Trinity Hall, and was also appointed Regius Professor of Civil Law. He afterwards studied law at Lincoln's-inn and the Middle Temple. He received the degree of barrister-at-law in June, 1850, and was subsequently appointed Reader on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law to the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple. On the death of Mr. William Ritchie, formerly Advocate-General of Bengal, in 1862, he was selected to succeed that gentleman as Legal Member of the Supreme Council of India, and such was the appreciation of his eminent services in that capacity, that he was re-appointed for a second term of office, and returned to India in February, 1868. He is succeeded in the Council of India, as we announced some months ago, by Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C.

Mr. J. F. MARSDEN has been appointed to officiate as Professor of English Law in the Presidency College, Madras, during the absence on leave of Mr. J. H. A. Branson, barrister-at-law.

Mr. FRANCIS WILLIAM JONES, solicitor, of Gloucester, has been elected Clerk of the Peace for that city, in the room of Mr. Charles Smalbridge, deceased. Mr. Jones is a son of Mr. Anthony Gilbert Jones, a solicitor of old standing in Gloucester. The town council of that city have fixed the salary of the new clerk of the peace at £84 per annum, and have resolved that he shall account to the Borough Fund for all fees payable by virtue of his office in respect of business done at the quarter sessions, and also in respect of the Criminal Justice and Juvenile Offenders' Acts; retaining all other fees for his own benefit.

Mr. B. CAMPBELL, solicitor, of Warwick, has been appointed Clerk to the County Magistrates of that district, in the room of the late Mr. F. Tibbits.

Mr. FREDERICK GREATREX, solicitor, of Stafford, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE JURISDICTION OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—The Judicature Commissioners have very recently transmitted to the judges of the county courts a long series of questions, and, as many of them involve matters of great importance to the due administration of justice, it is obviously desirable that they should be fully "ventilated" in all professional circles. With the view, therefore, of attracting towards these queries the largest amount of attention, I purpose, with your permission, to print them by weekly instalments in your columns, appending to those of the greatest interest the answers which I consider they ought to receive. The first three questions are as follows:—

"1. Is it in your opinion desirable to increase or lessen the jurisdiction of the county courts, and if so, to what extent?"

"2. Should the limit of jurisdiction be a pecuniary one? If so, is there any reason why the limit should be fixed in equity, admiralty, and common law proceedings respectively, at £500, £300, and £50?"

"3. Ought the superior courts to retain a concurrent jurisdiction with the county courts, or ought the county courts to have exclusive jurisdiction up to any and what fixed amount?"

No one can read these few lines without perceiving that the learned Commissioners are but little satisfied with the law as it exists, and there is something almost grotesque in their grave demand of a reason, why the limit of jurisdiction in the county courts should be fixed at a scale ten times higher in equity, and six times higher in admiralty, than at common law. But, in fact, this question, striking as it is, gives only a faint and most imperfect idea of the anomalies which actually prevail in practice. First, let us consider the matter with respect to common law proceedings alone. Over all claims founded on contract, other than for breach of promise of marriage, the county court has original and exclusive jurisdiction up to £20, and concurrent jurisdiction up to £50 (see and compare 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 58; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 1; and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 5), and, under certain circumstances, the judges at Westminster may transmit to the county courts any action of contract, provided the claim does not exceed the latter amount. (See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 26; and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 7.) If the claim, however, be founded on tort, the law is very different, for not only is the county court deprived of all original jurisdiction over actions for malicious prosecution, libel, slander, and seduction (see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 58), but in every other action of tort the exclusive jurisdiction is limited to £10, being just one-half of the sum which forms the limit in actions on contract. (See 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 5.) It is true that the original concurrent jurisdiction of the county courts is fixed at £50 in actions of tort as well as in actions on contract (see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 58, and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 1); but here comes the astounding distinction between the two forms of action; for, while the superior courts have no power to send to the county courts any action of contract where the claim exceeds £50, they may, in certain events, transmit to the inferior tribunal any action of tort, including those forms of action which cannot originally be brought in the county court at all, and this too, whatever be the amount sought to be recovered, and however complex the facts or uncertain the law may chance to be. (See 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 10.) I myself, under this enactment, have had to dispose of one case, where the damage sought to be recovered amounted to £1,000, while in another for £700, I had to examine some fifteen or twenty witnesses on either side; and in several other cases where the damages were laid for large amounts, the matters in dispute involved as difficult questions, both of law and of fact, as could well arise in a trial at Nisi Prius.

It certainly, then, is a wondrous law which prohibits a tradesman from "county courting" his refractory customer in the event of his bill exceeding the magic sum of £50, and which yet permits a superior judge to send for trial in a county court a claim of several hundreds or even thousands of pounds, brought, it may be, by a man who has been permanently injured by a railway collision, or who contends that his character has been blasted by a libel or a malicious prosecution. A judge, too, whom the Legislature regards as incompetent to decide whether a young lady is entitled to a salary of £60 as a nursery governess, is supposed, in the eye of the law, to have ample faculties for determining whether the lady's father has any right to demand £1,000 on a legal quibble of loss of service in the event of his daughter's seduction.

Next, if we turn to the contrast afforded by the £500, and the £300 to which the learned Commissioners have drawn attention as being the respective limits of county court jurisdiction in equity and admiralty proceedings, we shall find that this contrast is far less remarkable than it might have been made, if all the real facts had been brought under notice. No doubt, it is difficult to imagine that any sensible reason could be given for the selection of these two widely different figures, and the case becomes the more hopeless when the £50 limit in most cases of common law is also brought into the comparison. Still, these anomalies shrink into insignificance when placed side by side with what I am now going to mention, and that is, that while in equity every suitor, up to £500, has the option of having recourse either to the superior or to the inferior court, the jurisdiction of the county court being simply concurrent—at least, so far as the statute law is concerned (see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, and Simons v. McAdam, L. R. 6 Eq. 324, per Malins, V.C.)—in admiralty proceedings that jurisdiction, when it exist at all, is rendered practically exclusive by the Act itself. (See 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 6.) The suitor indeed may proceed in the High Court of Admiralty, but only at the imminent risk of losing all costs, if he does not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the county court jurisdiction is limited. The real contrast, therefore, as between proceedings in admiralty and at common law is measured by the respective figures of £1,000, £300, and £150, in the one case, and £20 or £10 in the other. I have given the three sums of £1,000, £300, and £150, because it is not strictly accurate to state, with the learned Commissioners, that £300 is the limit in admiralty jurisdiction. That is the sum named in the statute when the claim is for damage to cargo, or for damage by collision, but for some inscrutable cause, the limit is fixed at £150, if the claim be for towage, necessities, or wages, while a claim for salvage must be brought in the county court, if either the amount claimed does not exceed £300, or the value of the property saved does not exceed £1,000. What renders this enactment the less defensible is, that in several of the instances mentioned in the Act, as for example, in cases of collision, the complainant has the option of proceeding either at common law or under the maritime law. If he adopts the former course he cannot sue in the county court should the claim exceed £50, but if the latter, he must sue there unless his claim exceeds £300. The judge who is deemed incompetent to try the question on the one side of his court, is considered the only competent judge to try it on the other side.

To complete the picture of county court jurisdiction it is only necessary to mention what seems to have escaped the notice of the Commissioners, that under Sir Robert Collier's Act of last session the county courts, except in the metropolis, have exclusive and unlimited jurisdiction in bankruptcy, within their respective districts (see 32 & 33 Vict. c. 77, s. 59); and that while litigants may, by a written memorandum, confer jurisdiction to any extent on a county court judge, provided the proceedings be governed by the common and maritime law (see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 23, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, r. 4), no such powers are intrusted to disputants where the controversy must be governed by equity.

In my next letter I shall attempt to point out what remedies should be applied to this discreditable state of the law; and, in the meanwhile, hoping that what I have here written may bear fruit by attracting attention to the subject,

I remain, yours faithfully,
A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

THE MIDDLE TEMPLE LIBRARY.

Sir,—May I be permitted, through your columns, to call attention to an abuse which seems to me to call for redress. I am a barrister belonging to the Middle Temple, and as such occasionally make use of the library belonging to that Inn. I had occasion the other day to ask for "Cole on Ejectment," and was informed that one of the benchers had it out of the library. This is really, in my humble judgment, too bad. A rare work, or one which does not usually form part of a private library, perhaps, a bencher ought to be entitled to take away; but an ordinary and well-known manual or text-book a man of a bencher's position at the Bar ought to have in his own library. It is obvious that a young man starting in the profession may not be able to afford to get all the best treatises on a given subject, and may fairly have occasion to supplement his scanty library by recourse to the general library of the Inn. But it seems to me conduct that can only be characterized as "shabby" on the part of a bencher to take away text-books from the library, and so prevent their use by those who may be excused for not possessing them, because he is too stingy to buy the latest editions for himself. If he wishes to spare his pocket he should not be above coming to the library and taking his chance with the other members of the Inn. But the custom which entitles benchers to take out books savours only too much of their general tendency to look on themselves as a body existing and holding revenues and profits principally for their own benefit, and not in a fiduciary character for the purposes of a great public trust.

A MIDDLE TEMPLAR.

OBITUARY.

MR. N. BASEVI.

The death of Mr. Nathaniel Basevi, barrister-at-law, took place at Torquay on the 9th December, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. The late Mr. Basevi was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in March, 1819. He formerly practised as a conveyancer, but for some years past he had relinquished the duties of his profession.

MR. J. R. ROSE.

We have to record the death of Mr. John Randolph Rose, of Stoke-upon-Trent, who had for about thirty years filled the office of Chief Clerk in the Stipendiary Magistrate's Court of the Potteries district. Mr. Rose expired on the 7th of December, at Ventnor, in the Isle of Wight, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health. In 1839, on the passing of the Potteries' Stipendiary Justice Act, Mr. T. B. Rose, brother of the deceased gentleman, was appointed the first magistrate of the new district, and Mr. J. R. Rose received the appointment of Chief Clerk in August of the same year. The clerk's salary was originally £250 a year, but in consequence of his increasing duties it was eventually raised to £350 per annum. Mr. J. E. Davis, the present stipendiary magistrate, re-appointed Mr. Rose to the chief-clerkship on his accession to the office. On the day following Mr. Rose's death, Mr. Davis, at the Longton Police Court, made a feeling allusion to the deceased gentleman, and paid a tribute to his unflinching courtesy and even temper. Mr. D. S. Sutton, solicitor, said he most cordially endorsed the remarks which Mr. Davis had so feelingly made. As a practitioner in the Potteries' Courts for fifteen years, and having had acquaintance with Mr. Rose from the time of his taking office, he had much pleasure in testifying to the unvarying kindness and ability of Mr. Rose, which was acknowledged and appreciated by every member of the profession practising in the courts. Mr. Rose was also clerk to several bodies of county magistrates in the district.

MR. GEORGE LAWTON.

The career of this venerable gentleman, a proctor of the ecclesiastical courts of York, deserves more than a passing notice at our hands. Mr. Lawton expired at Nunthorpe, on the first of December, having attained the mature age of ninety years. As a member of the York ecclesiastical courts, he had served under five successive archbishops—Markham, Harcourt, Musgrave, Longley, and Thompson—and had probably been engaged in most of the ecclesiastical causes decided within that province during the present century. Mr. Lawton was the author of several works bearing on his branch of the legal profession. In 1823 he wrote and published, "The Marriage Act, arranged with Notes," a second edition appearing in the following year. He was also the author of "A Treatise on Bona Notabilia, with an Account of the Archbishop's Courts of Probate within the Province of York, and of the Peculiar Courts of Probate," which appeared in 1825; and in 1853 he wrote an account of the Religious Houses of Yorkshire. His greatest work, however, was entitled "Collectio Rerum Ecclesiasticarum de Diocesi Eboracensi," a work of great industry and research, and of which the then Archbishop (Howley) of Canterbury, wrote in the highest terms. For nearly thirty years past it has been a standard work of reference with respect to the churches and chapels in the dioceses of York and Ripon. In his earlier years Mr. Lawton was an active supporter of the religious societies of York, and was one of the oldest members of the Yorkshire Philosophical Society, which was mainly brought into existence through his exertions.

THE BREHON LAW OF IRELAND.

On the 6th ult., Mr. J. B. Falconer, A.B., delivered an address on this subject before this Dublin Law Students Society. We extract the following:—

From the Brehon Laws, we are able to form a correct notion of the state of society in Ireland from a very early period to the arrival of the first Norman settlers in the country. The state of society was patriarchal, and chiefly pastoral. The feeling of the unity of the family or tribe was paramount, and the interests of the individual were still in abeyance. We have no reason, however, to suspect that the power of the head of the family in Ireland ever rose to such a pitch as the Patria Potestas of the Romans. The Irish rather resembled the Israelites of old in their institutions. By what may by analogy be called the common law of our Celtic forefathers, the land belonging to each sept was divided into common pasture lands, common tillage lands, private demesne lands, and the demesne lands of the tribe. Each member of the sept had the right of pasturo for his cattle upon the common pasture lands. The share he received of the common tillage lands depended upon the number of cattle he possessed. Perhaps the strangest of their institutions to modern eyes is this fact, that annually the common tillage lands were redistributed, by hotch-potch, as it was called, to each member of the sept, in proportion to the number of his cattle.* This peculiarity, however, will be intelligible if we recollect that the members of the tribe were all presumably of one family, that the interests of the tribe were considered paramount, those of the ordinary individual member quite subordinate. The demesne lands of the tribe were assigned for the support of the chief, the chief-elect of Tanist, the Brehons or judges, and the bards and doctors. The sept at large then possessed the indefeasible property in all the lands occupied by it, or as is technically called, the allodial property. Nor were they liable to be ejected from their lands, for the chief took as his tribute only a tithe of the increase of the cattle, which he was bound himself to levy at certain seasons. In the demesne lands of the tribe, however, the chief, the Tanist, the Brehon, the bard, and the doctor, had life interests, of which the reversion lay to their successors, who were usually members of their own family. The chief was usually elected before the death of his predecessor, and usually belonged to the same family. The rule was that the eldest of the candidates, if not incapacitated by age, should have the preference, the brother being commonly chosen instead of the son, and the son rather than the nephew. His revenue arose from the tithe of the increase of the flocks, and from the proceeds of his demesne lands. He had also certain rights of entertainment for himself and household, at stated times, in the houses of his tenants. These rights were sometimes commuted for an equivalent in tribute, but enough was claimed to bring into disrepute these great Irish exactions as they were called, of Coyne, Livery, and Bonaght. The land owners below the rank of chieftain held their lands by a peculiar tenure. On the decease of a proprietor, instead of an equal partition among his children, as in the gavelkind of English law, the chief of the sept, according to the generally received explanation, made, or was entitled to make, a fresh division of all the lands within his district, allotting to the heirs of the deceased a portion of the integral territory along with the other members of the tribe. As to what we may call the statute law of the old Irish nation, it is not certain whether the enactments were decreed by a general assembly, or by the local chiefs independently. The manuscripts which we have of them profess to be but transcripts and collections, and continually refer to similar compilations of older date. The law relating to crimes was similar to that in use amongst other ancient nations; it was indeed an improvement on that law which commanded that an eye should be given for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. It is not disputed that the lex talionis did at one time hold in Ireland, but we are informed that Feidhlimedh Reachtonhar, surnamed the Law Giver, in the second century, altered that into a system of punishment by fine. Certain heinous crimes, such as murder, still remained punishable by death, as they are even now. Lesser offences, however, were punished by the Brehon laws, with fines strictly proportioned to their enormity. This fine was called an eric, and the same term was used for rents, &c. These fines, as I have said, varied in proportion to the offence, but in Ireland, they also increased in proportion to the rank of the wrong-doer.

We have, unfortunately, no means of ascertaining exactly when these Brehon Laws were first established in Ireland, but it is conjectured from internal evidence that they were in use at least so early as 100 B.C.; the version however of them which we possess is not nearly so old. The date of the institution of the Seanchas Mor, to which I have referred, is settled at 440 A.D. It is certain, however, that the code of Brehon Laws in use since the beginning of the fifth century was revised by Saint Patrick, to whom, therefore, we owe our gratitude, as well for introducing the blessing of Christianity into this island, as for improving its laws. Concerning this revision we are told that "whatever did not clash with the Word of God, in the written law, and in the New Testament, and in the consciences of men, was confirmed in the laws of the Brehons by Patrick." It is remarkable that a similar purification of the Roman civil law had taken place shortly before under Theodosius, Emperor of the East, and Valentinian, Emperor of the West. St. Augustine is said to have performed the same service, about 597 A.D. for the Saxon laws, in the reign of King Ethelbert, when his tribe became Christians. These Brehon Laws were nominally supplanted by the Feudal Laws, in 1172, when some of the Irish chieftains and the Norman settlers took the oath of allegiance to Henry II., and agreed to hold their lands of him by feudal tenure. It was not likely, however, that a code of laws which had penetrated the whole social system of a country, and to which the natives were attached, could be removed from its supremacy over their minds and actions by the mere desire of a foreign king, especially as the power of the latter was never sufficiently strong in the country to uphold his own authority, even over his born subjects; so we find for many centuries there was a continual collision between the two systems. Within the Pale the feudal system obtained, beyond it the Brehon laws; while on the borders the unfortunate inhabitants suffered from the worst features of both. Into the history of this conflict I shall not enter, for obvious reasons; suffice it to say, that down to the seventeenth century statutes innumerable were passed in vain to compel obedience to the English laws. By some of these a practical illustration of the doctrine of "killing no murder" was given. As Henry II. had stipulated with the inhabitants of this country to allow them to use their own laws the Irish were consequently held to be beyond the pale of justice; they were regarded as aliens, at the best, sometimes as enemies, by the English courts; so that it was not deemed felony to kill one of the Irish race, unless he had conformed to the English law. Five septs to which the royal families of Ireland belonged—the O'Neals, O'Connors, O'Briens, O'Mcloghlin, and MacMurroughs—however, had the special immunity of being within the protection of the law, and it was felony to kill one of them. We find in Hallam that these slight inconveniences were so much felt, that in 1278 some small number of septs dwelling among the Norman colony applied to be admitted to live by their law, and offered 8,000 marks for the favour. The letter of Edward I. to the justiciary in Ireland on this is characteristic of his wisdom and his rapaciousness. He is satisfied of the expediency of granting the request, provided it can be done with the consent of the prelates and nobles in Ireland, and directs the justiciary, if he can obtain that concurrence, to agree with the petitioners for the highest fine he can obtain, and for a body of good and stout soldiers. But this consent of the aristocracy was withheld. Excuses were made to evade the king's desire. It was wholly incompatible with their systematic encroachments on their Irish neighbours to give them the safeguard of the king's writ for their possessions. The Irish renewed their application more than once, both to Edward I and Edward III. They found the same readiness in the English court; they sank at home through the same unconquerable oligarchy. On the other hand we find that the Norman barons who had been longest in Ireland, and who had most communication with the Irish, cast off their old associations, and adopted the laws and customs of Ireland. They, in fact, acted so that they were said to be more Irish than the Irish themselves, and were styled by the uncomplimentary name of "degenerate English." We are told they intermarried with the Irish; they connected themselves with them by the national custom of fostering, which formed an artificial relationship of the strongest nature; they spoke the Irish language; they administered Irish laws; they became chieftains rather than peers; and neither regarded the king's summons to his Parliament, nor paid any obedience to his judges. To prevent this conformity to the Irish people many laws were passed, the most celebrated of which is the Statute of Kilkenny. Not a vestige of these Brehon laws remains now in the system in force in Ireland, but I think it will be apparent that a diligent study of them will explain many seemingly incomprehensible facts in the state of our country. No system of laws could hold sway over a nation for sixteen hundred years without leaving its traces on the memories of that nation for generations after it had ceased to be employed. This was especially likely to be the case with a people such as the Irish, who were debarred from much communication with the outer world, and, thus thrown back on their national traditions, became from their misfortunes naturally laudatores temporis acti. As I have already said, the main distinctive feature of the Brehon laws was the fact that the land was held to be possessed by the tribe in common, and not by separate individual proprietors. It was this circumstance of the right to the land which was the direct cause of war between the Irish people and the Norman and English colonists. It is this question which still disturbs the well-being of the country.

* This is somewhat analogous to the re-distribution of Lammas lands or Dole meads, as they are variously called, which takes place in some localities in England.—Ed. S. J.

COURT PAPERS.

CHANCERY NOTICE.

During the Christmas Vacation, all applications to the Court of Chancery, which are of an urgent nature, are to be made to or at the chambers of the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Millbourne James.

All applications ex parte are to be sent to the Vice-Chancellor James, by book post or parcel, prepaid, accompanied with the brief of counsel, indorsed with the terms of the order applied for, and an envelope capable of receiving the papers to be returned, with sufficient stamps affixed thereon, and addressed as follows:—"To the Registrar in Vacation, Chancery Registrar's Office, Chancery-lane, London, W.C."

On applications for injunctions or writs of Ne exeat regno, there must be sent, in addition to the above, a copy of the bill, a certificate of bill filed, and office copies of the affidavits in support of the application.

The papers sent to the Vice-Chancellor, with any order his Honour may make thereon, will be returned direct to the registrar.

All applications for leave to give notice of motion only may be made to the chief clerk at chambers.

The Vice-Chancellor's address can be obtained on application at his Honour's chambers, 11, New-square, Lincoln's-inn.

The chambers of the Vice-Chancellor James will be open on the 24th, 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st Dec. 1869, and the 4th, 5th, and 6th Jan. 1870, from eleven to one o'clock.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The markets are all dull and can hardly be expected to rally between this and the Christmas holidays. Some large sales have exercised a depressing influence on the funds, and favourable foreign exchanges coupled with a very fair bullion influx failed to re-invigorate them. The railway market alone made a decided advance at one period of the week; it recoiled, however, and is now heavy. Foreign securities are, if anything, a trifle less dull than other investments, but no reliance can now be placed upon their fluctuations.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., has been nominated by the Lord Chief Justice to be one of the governors of Eton College.

It is said that the Government have instructed Mr. Godfrey Lushington to draft a new Trades Union Bill based on the principles advocated by Mr. Hughes, Q.C.

Mr. Henry Jacob has resigned the office of Clerk to the Magistrates of the City of Oxford, which he had filled for upwards of thirty-four years. Previous to his appointment as magistrates' clerk, Mr. Jacob had discharged the duty of chief clerk to Mr. Roberson, Town Clerk of Oxford, so that his official career has extended over a period of nearly half-a-century. The appointment of Mr. Jacob's successors rests with the magistrates of the city of Oxford.

The appointment of Chief Clerk to the Stipendiary Magistrate of the Potteries district, in Staffordshire, has become vacant by the death of Mr. J. R. Rose, who filled the office for a period of thirty years. The nomination of Mr. Rose's successor rests with Mr. Davis, the stipendiary magistrate, subject to the sanction of the stipendiary commissioners. The chief clerk is required by the "Potteries Stipendiary Justice Act" of 1839, to attend the magisterial courts personally, and not by deputy, substitute, or proxy, except in the case of illness or other like causes. He is not allowed to practise as a solicitor or attorney, nor as clerk to a solicitor or attorney, nor as clerk to any Board of Guardians.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS & COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite. The "Civil Service Gazette" remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in tin-lined packets, labelled—JAMES EPPS & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.—ADVT.

LONDON, DECEMBER, 25, 1869.

AS FAR AS popular feeling is concerned, it is undoubtedly fortunate for the Overend & Gurney directors that their trial did not take place two years ago. For the first twelve months after the stoppage of the company it would have been scarcely inaccurate to describe them as the most unpopular men in England. Every outburst of strong feeling, however, is followed by a revulsion, in addition to which there have been other causes tending to withdraw public sympathy from the prosecution. The verdict delivered on Wednesday has taken no one by surprise; and setting aside the intrinsic merits of the case, the advantages of advocacy and skilful conduct were all on the side of the defence. A particularly unfortunate blunder was made by the prosecution in bringing into the witness-box wholly unnecessarily, a witness whom the defence had been longing to call.

The charges on which the defendants were arraigned resolve themselves practically into a charge of conspiring to commit the offence marked out in section 84 of the Larceny Act, under which every director who makes or concurs in making any written statement or account which he knows to be false, with intent to cheat or defraud any shareholder or creditor, or to induce any person to become a shareholder, is rendered guilty of a misdemeanour.

Conspiracy is a very wide and vague offence almost, if not quite, incapable of receiving a definition. It is not enough to say that any conspiracy to do an unlawful act is criminal, for this would by no means include all cases. An act may be not criminal if committed by one person, it may not even be an act the commission of which would subject the person committing it to the payment of damages on a civil action; and yet, if several persons combine to commit the same act, the combination may be indictable as a conspiracy. Thus it has been held to be a conspiracy to combine to hiss an actor, although a single individual might hiss him without incurring any liability whatever. In the present case the joint offence, if any, was an act which would have been an offence if committed by a single person, because it had already been made an offence by statute. It would have been enough to secure a conviction if the prosecution had proved that the defendants combined to put forth a wilful misstatement in order to induce any person to become a shareholder, and in proving this it would have been sufficient to prove an intent decided against the public generally, and acted on by some individual. It would also, as we think, have been sufficient to show that the misstatement was made, not necessarily with express knowledge of its falsehood, but in wilful ignorance of the facts, upon the principle on which a man might be convicted for knowingly receiving stolen goods if he wilfully closed his eyes against strong cause for suspicion. Happily it is not necessary for us to venture on the troubled sea of figures which appalled even the Lord Chief Justice himself. A complete investigation of the case has shown clearly enough that there was no misstatement or concealment sufficient to support the charge. The accusation founded on the existence of two separate deeds falls completely to the ground: the utmost that can be said against the directors is, that they believed they had a business which, though it had been mismanaged, had in it the elements of success, and would succeed with new capital; but that, if they had given the public the materials on which they formed that opinion, the public would not have found the capital.

The Lord Chief Justice observed, in the course of his charge, that certain of the counts, were not maintainable as to persons who had purchased their shares in the market. This introduces a principle akin to that laid down by Lord Romilly, in Duranty's case (26 Beav. 268), that misrepresentation by directors will entitle a shareholder to repudiate shares purchased in the market, though it entitles him to get rid of an original allotment. This has long been recognised as a fixed principle and was re-affirmed in Oakes v. Turquand. The principle purports to be that there is in the former case no privity between the company and the purchaser of the shares. We cannot, however, help doubting the propriety of extending its operation to criminal charges like the present. If the intention is to induce A. B., as one of the public, to become a shareholder, by inserting in a prospectus false puffs of the company, the plan may succeed either by A. B.'s applying for shares direct, or by his buying shares of somebody else. The credit of the company has been wrongfully raised to such a height that A. B. takes the shares wherever he can get them; and if the intent was to raise the credit of the company, so that the public generally might be induced to become shareholders, it should matter nothing whether a man goes straight to the company's office for an allotment, or buys from anyone who will sell. There is a perceptible difference between a criminal case depending on the criminality of the intent and a civil one turning on the nature and results of the contract of membership.

Lord Hatherley has already held that there is no equitable remedy against the directors, and as they have now been acquitted on the criminal charge, it is probable that no further proceedings will be taken. The only proceedings now remaining open would be an action for misrepresentation, which, in the face of what has been shown at the late trial, could not hope to succeed—or an action on the case for negligence in investing the capital of the company in the purchase of a very bad bargain. The directors will probably be vexed no further. Concurring, however, as we do, most unreservedly, in the verdict just pronounced, we cannot sympathize in the smallest degree with the acclamation with which it was received by many of those who heard it. Although no legal fraud has been committed, yet, let the matter be put how it will, there remains this—that the directors had no right to invite the public to come into the business without informing them fully of its condition. Admittedly, the directors believed that with the new capital a success would be achieved for themselves and the shareholders, but those whom they invited to join them ought to have been placed in a position to judge of that question for themselves.

WHERE, as in England, there is no public prosecutor, but the duty of bringing to justice offenders against the State is thrown upon private individuals, it is evidently of the utmost importance—indeed, it is absolutely essential for the working of the system at all—that provision should be made for re-imbursement to prosecutors all expenses reasonably incurred in prosecutions properly undertaken by them. It is, important, therefore, that any defects or inconsistencies in the law upon this subject should be fully understood; and on at least two occasions lately the matter has been before the Courts.

Application was made to the Lord Chief Justice on Wednesday last for a certificate entitling the prosecutor in the case against the Overend-Gurney directors to be repaid by the county the costs of the prosecution; and the Chief Justice—while he gave the reasons for which, if he had had the power, he would not have made the order asked for—further pointed out that, inasmuch as the case had been removed into the Queen's Bench by certiorari, he had, in fact, no such power. There is no doubt, we fear, upon the authority, that the Lord Chief Justice was right in his view. But it is a very grave and very mischievous anomaly that, because the accused think fit to change the tribunal, the prosecutor, however proper the prosecution, should be burdened with the costs.

As a general rule every prosecutor becomes such by his own act and of his own free will; but there are some cases in which a man may be compelled to prosecute. For instance, under section 223 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, an assignee in bankruptcy may be directed to prosecute the bankrupt for certain offences if committed by him, and the same section provided very properly, not only that the prosecutor in such a case should be allowed his expenses, to be paid by the county in the ordinary way, but also that any expenses incurred by him, and not allowed in this way, should be paid out of the fund, known as the Chief Registrar's Account. And the importance of this provision for extra costs beyond those strictly allowable on taxation will be at once understood by any one familiar with legal proceedings of any kind. But by the Courts of Justice (Salaries and Funds) Act of last session (32 & 33 Vict. c. 91), this fund with others was transferred to the National Debt Commissioners. It is true that by section 13 it is said, that amongst other things, "all sums payable, &c., out of any of the stock and cash transferred under this Act, &c., shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament for the purpose." And it is possible that this section may be wide enough to cover the case in question; but, practically, there is, we believe, no doubt that, since the 1st October last, when the Act came into operation, there has been no fund out of which extra costs incurred by one directed to prosecute under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, can be paid. Of course, under that Act, the difficulty will exist only till the 1st January next, but the case will remain much the same under the system which is then to come into operation. By section 16 of the Debtors Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62) a trustee may be ordered to prosecute a bankrupt, and, by section 17, he is in such case to be allowed his costs. But no provision is made for extra costs. We fear that this will interfere materially with the efficiency of prosecutions under the Act.

THE APPEAL FROM THE DECISION OF Vice-Chancellor James to wind up the Family Endowment Society—one of the companies amalgamated by the Albert—at the instance of an annuity holder, was heard this week before the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice Giffard, when judgment was reserved, the Lord Chancellor observing that the point was one of great importance as governing so many cases. The decision will probably be delivered at the beginning of Hilary term. It is to be wished, for the settlement of doubts, that the same question had been raised in the case of a policy-holder.

THERE IS SOMETHING REMARKABLE in a letter published in the Times of Monday from Mr. R. Dawson, the attorney for the Overend & Gurney prosecution. The Times having accidentally omitted from its report the name of Mr. Yelverton, the second of the junior counsel for the prosecution, the attorney writes to request that the omission may be supplied. There was nothing very remarkable in this, but the attorney goes on to give Mr. Yelverton the benefit of a gratuitous certificate that he has "most assiduously attended to my instructions throughout," adding that to this junior his two leaders owe their briefs. Generally speaking, the leading counsel owe their briefs to the attorney, and not to their junior, who, in the present case, is stated to have "introduced" Dr. Kenely and Mr. Macrae Moir to Mr. Dawson. The principal remark, however, which we have to make upon this piece of correspondence is the following:—When a puff is published the reader ought to be told who makes it, as an index to its value. Having taken an opportunity of advertising the world that Mr. Yelverton had "most assiduously attended to his instructions," Mr. Dawson might in candour have stated that Mr. Yelverton is his own son.

THE Economist thinks that joint-stock companies should be obliged to publish their articles of association, and all documents referred to therein. We made a similar proposal some years ago, and still hold the same opinion. Intending shareholders, of course, can always, if they choose, "inspect" these documents; but it is a very different thing to read a document at your leisure in a printed copy. It may be said that the public would gain nothing, since experience shows that in making their investments they pay no attention to anything but their own fancies. Admitting all that can be urged on this score, and crediting the public with what is undoubtedly their due, gross carelessness, we still think that all these things may be exaggerated. Further than this, as our contemporary has pointed out, persons who will take no thought for themselves attend to the observations of the press, and, with the opportunities which such publication would afford, the press might make itself a very efficient censor of new undertakings.

THE ARMY AND THE LAW OF LIBEL.

The important decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Dawkins v. Lord F. Paulet, on which we have already briefly commented, deserves the minute and attentive consideration of all who are interested in the development of constitutional law. According to the old fiction, each new proposition laid down by a superior court is nothing but the articulate embodiment of the mysterious treasure of common law which is supposed to be "in the breast of the judges." Yet there can be no doubt that judge-made law is often as entirely new as a legislative enactment. And of this unquestionable truth there could hardly be a more conclusive proof than the recent decision in the case of Colonel Dawkins. If the opinion of the majority of the judges be really law, an officer in the British army will for the future find himself, in many important respects, only one remove from an outlaw. Redress before the ordinary tribunals of the country will be denied him. For a civil wrong done to him by his superior in rank, he will have to seek such satisfaction as he may be able to obtain at the hands of a military court.

The recent case was decided upon demurrer, and for the purposes of the judgment all the allegations contained in the pleadings must be taken to be true. If they are capable of being borne out by the evidence, and the plaintiff is nevertheless unable to recover, his plight is indeed a sad one. His is emphatically one of those hard cases which it has been said make bad law. Let us see whether in this instance the opinion of the Chief Justice, who dissented from the rest of the Court, really is bad law, or whether it may not perhaps be supported as being in accordance with principle and not absolutely opposed to authority.

The declaration was for libel, and stated that the plaintiff was an officer in the army, and held a commission as captain in the Coldstream Guards, and that the defendant falsely and maliciously wrote and published of the plaintiff certain letters (which were the libels complained of) whereby the plaintiff lost his commission. The letters were, prima facie, of a defamatory and injurious nature.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded that he was the superior military officer of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was under his command; that it was his duty, as such superior military officer, to forward to the adjutant-general of the army certain letters written and sent to him, as such superior officer, in relation to their military conduct, duties, and qualifications by the officers under his command, and to make, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief, reports in writing to the adjutant-general on the subject of such letters; and the defendant, as such superior officer, had received from the plaintiff certain letters in relation to the military duties of the plaintiff, and to certain orders received by the plaintiff as such officer, and to his conduct and competence and fitness for his duties as such officer, in which letters the plaintiff requested that the same might be forwarded by the defendant to the adjutant-general for the information of the Commander-in-Chief of the army; and thereupon the defendant, in the ordinary course of his military duty as such superior officer, and because it became and was necessary and incumbent upon him, by his duty to her Majesty as such superior officer, so to do, and as an act of military duty, and not otherwise, forwarded the letters to the adjutant-general; and, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief, when forwarding such letters, made certain reports in writing in relation to the letters of the plaintiff, which are the letters of the defendant, and the writings and publishings complained of.

The plaintiff replied to this plea that the words in the declaration mentioned were written and published by the defendant with actual malice, and without any reasonable, probable, or justifiable cause, and not bona fide or in the bona fide discharge of the defendant's duty as such superior officer. The defendant demurred to the replication, on the ground that no action was maintainable against him in respect of words written and published under the circumstances alleged in the plea, even though they were written and published maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause; and the Court (Mellor, Lush, and Hayes, JJ., Cockburn. C.J., dissenting) sustained the demurrer.

Now, upon the general principles of law, apart from any special rules which may govern the army, Colonel Dawkins would be certainly entitled to a verdict, if he succeeded in proving the facts stated in his replication. Express malice is, generally speaking, a good answer to the defence of privilege. A privileged occasion protects an ordinary person only within the limits of the bona fide discharge of his duty. Thus, a master may and of course is bound to give a bad character to a bad servant. But if he should maliciously do so he will be liable to an action. Nay, further, so jealous is the law that the good repute of nobody should be unjustly taken away, that "privilege" will not protect violent or extravagant assertions beyond what the particular occasion may justify. A good example of this will be found in Fryer v. Kinnarsley, (12 W. R. 155), where the defendant, a member of the Horticultural Society, had hired the plaintiff as a gardener on the recommendation of the manager of the society. Subsequently, the defendant dismissed the plaintiff, and wrote to the manager that "Fryer was extremely violent, came towards me several times with an open clasp-knife in his hand, and eyes starting from the sockets with rage, a perfect raving madman." The jury, in an action of libel based on this letter, found that it was libellous but written bona fide, and not maliciously, and the question whether it was under these circumstances privileged or not was afterwards argued in the Court of Common Pleas. But the judges passed this question by, saying that whatever might be their opinion on it was not material, inasmuch as by the vehemence of the defendant's expressions he had, although acting bona fide and not maliciously, put himself outside the protection with which he might otherwise have been clothed.

But is there anything in the constitution of the army which should exclude soldiers from the operation of these general principles of law? It is replied that there is; that the army stands outside all our ordinary institutions; and that by the Mutiny Act and Articles of War, a subordinate who is injured by his superior must seek his remedy from a military court of enquiry. The immunity from civil action enjoyed by the superior is also likened to that enjoyed by a judge or by jurors, an analogy which is obviously too imperfect to be worth much. A superior officer who forwards a report to the adjutant-general reflecting on a subaltern is much more like a prosecutor than a judge. Then, again, it is objected that a jury are an incompetent and unfit tribunal to try questions which may involve minute inquiries into military matters. The answer to this objection made by the counsel for the plaintiff in Sutton v. Johnstone (1 T. R. 493), appears irresistible. "The argument," he observed, "on the incompetency of juries to try questions of this nature [the action there was by one naval officer against another for malicious prosecution] is not entitled to much weight when it is considered that almost all the injuries which one individual may receive from another, and which are the foundation of numberless actions, involve in them questions peculiar to the trades and conditions of the parties. In an action against a surgeon for negligence the question may turn on a nice point of surgery; but the jury must attend to the witnesses, and decide according to their number, professional skill, and cause of knowledge; for, cuiuslibet in sua arte credendum est. In an action on a warranty in a life policy physicians must be examined. Many questions, even of navigation, must occur which must necessarily be decided by a jury, as in a case under the Hovering Act (24 Geo. 3 c. 47), when unavoidable necessity is to exculpate; so in cases of deviation on policies of insurance, or in cases of seaworthiness, or when one ship runs down another at sea by bad steering. Yet those actions are much more difficult, because they depend solely on questions of navigation. But the gist of the present action is malice and want of probable cause, which cannot involve any question of navigation or sea fighting, and the present verdict was not founded on any such evidence." We might summarise these remarks by saying that the professional incompetency of a jury is, in fact, the very measure and test of their judicial competency. Who would impel a jury of doctors to try a charge of malpraxis? They would be admirable and necessary witnesses in such a case; but their professional and technical knowledge would stand in the way of their being impartial judges of the facts. The function of a jury is to find out the truth in each particular case which comes before them from the evidence, and that alone, and the fewer preconceived notions of what the truth is they bring into the box with them the better will they do their duty.

There only remains to be considered the proposition that the army is under the provisions of the Mutiny Act and Articles of War, or ought to be upon grounds of public policy entirely without the law. Such appears to be the opinion as to its position of the majority of the Court of Queen's Bench; and as that opinion was necessary to their decision, it is now law, as far as a court of first instance can make it so, that no action for defamation or, indeed, any other tort to the person will lie in a civil court at the suit of a subaltern against his superior officer. In other words the subaltern has no remedy at all, for, practically, it would be a mere mockery of justice to appeal in such a case to a military court. It is scarcely probable that this conclusion will be acquiesced in without an appeal to a court of error, especially when it is remembered that the present state of the authorities in the courts below is conflicting. Very few have been the cases in the reports in which the status of military or naval officers has even been discussed, and, as far as we are aware, there are only two in which it has been actually adjudicated on; the one now under our consideration and the great case of Sutton v. Johnstone to which we have already referred. So far as that case definitively decided any question of law it is in direct conflict with the present decision. The Court of Exchequer distinctly held in a considered judgment that an action would lie by a subordinate against a superior officer for a wrongful act done in the course of discipline, if done malâ fide. Their observations on the policy of allowing such an action are worth quoting—"Cases may be put of situations so critical that the power (of the superior) ought to be unbounded; but it is impossible to state a case where it is necessary that it should be abused; and it is the felicity of those who live under a free constitution of government that it is equally impossible to state a case where it can be abused with impunity. The counsel for the defendant were disposed to agree to this general doctrine, provided that the question was not to be discussed in an action at law which unavoidably brings the inquiry into a matter of fact before a jury. We enter into all the difficulties in the situation of an officer whose honour and fortune may come to be so staked. But considerations of this nature cannot exclude the established jurisdiction of the country. Men of honour will do their duty, and will abide the consequences."

This portion of the judgment was not overruled on appeal, although Lord Mansfield did, it is true, on behalf of Lord Loughborough and himself, intimate dissent from it. According to their view the plaintiff should have sought a remedy from a military tribunal "capable of understanding that the first, second, and third part of a soldier is obedience." For this or other reasons they "leant" against introducing the action; but the judgment adds "there is no authority of any kind either way . . . and, therefore, it must be owned the question is doubtful. According to our opinion it is not necessary to the judgment in this case." And they proceed to decide against the plaintiff on the facts. We should add that the opinion above expressed against the action was assented to at Nisi Prius by Mr. Justice Willes in Darwins v. Lord Rokeby (4 F. & F. 806). The authorities therefore now stand thus; for the plaintiff, Sutton v. Johnstone, in the Court of Exchequer, and the judicial dictum of Chief Justice Cockburn in Darwins v. Lord F. Paulet; for the defendant, Darwins v. Lord F. Paulet, in the Court of Queen's Bench, and the judicial dicta of Lords Mansfield and Loughborough in the Court of Error in Sutton v. Johnstone, and of Mr. Justice Willes in Darwins v. Lord Rokeby. The balance of opinion, though not of decision, therefore, at present inclines somewhat in favour of the defendant. We shall await the further progress of the case with much interest. No doubt it is true, as Mr. Justice Mellor remarked, that a man may do his duty maliciously, but the real question seems to be whether the act done, when malice is the governing or only motive, does not cease to be an act of altogether. Malice, like violence of language, can undoubtedly in ordinary cases, turn what may be primâ facie lawful into what is unlawful; and this being so, the only safe ground for the recent decision is that, by becoming soldiers, men, for some purposes, are deprived of their rights, and set free from their liabilities as citizens.

LEGAL REPORTING.

[COMMUNICATED.]

It does not require any great acuteness to see that whatever may be the advantages of the present system of reporting in courts of law, there are some disadvantages to counterbalance them. It needs no argument to prove that there should be free trade in reporting. Every one who thinks he can command the confidence of the profession has a right to sit in a court and take notes of what goes on there, and if he cares to do so to publish them for general use. The penalty on him if he is inaccurate in reporting legal cases will be that his work will not sell, though if he be reporting for a newspaper, the penalty if there be one, is less certain in its operation. At present we are only concerned with the former case, and, since reporters vary as other men in capacity, it is evident that if four or five sets of reports obtain the substantial support of the profession, there is every likelihood that the reports will differ in merit, and if one set of reports could secure a preponderance of talent that they would drive the others from the field. The fact is, however, otherwise, and able and indifferent reporters seem pretty fairly balanced. Reporting is of two general kinds; there is the verbatim reporting and that which consists in giving a succinct account of what has occurred instead of setting out matters, arguments, and judgments at length; the latter of these under the present system is on the whole preferable, and for these reasons.

"The energy that it requires for a judge to hold his tongue" has become a proverbial saying, and, except in the rare instances where a counsel is listened to without interruption, the general tone of a judge's mind appears to the listener to be in almost every case opposed to the particular side of the question which is being supported at the time. It is natural that this should be so; the trained mind of the judge is endeavouring to pick holes in the advocacy of either side, as a means of arriving ultimately at the just conclusion between conflicting arguments. Hence remarks and scattered dicta are in verbatim reports interspersed throughout the arguments on one side or the other, frequently led up to by trains of thought common to judge and advocate, but unexpressed in words, and frequently simply interrogations which lose their character when divorced from inflexion and voice, and sometimes (for judges are human) unconsidered or petulant expressions which are produced by some passing thought. That such expressions should find their way into reports is a matter for regret; still more so when, as there is danger of their doing, they find their way into head-notes. Great judgment in such cases is required in the reporter, and the practice of lengthy verbatim reports is not the best training for such judgment. Where the dicta are incorporated in the judgment the evil of repetition arises, an evil already great enough in most cases. Thus a Court composed of four members sits in banco and delivers oral judgment in a case: at the conclusion of the argument all the judges usually take part in the decision, even where they all agree in the main. Here repetitions cannot fail to arise; indeed there are but few judges on the bench who do not repeat themselves. Are these repetitions necessary in the report?

It would, perhaps, be impossible to insist that in every case in which judgment is given there should be a written memorandum of the judgment and the reasons given by the Court, but the conclusion suggests itself that (on the common law side, at all events) it would be to the interest of the profession if in all cases of oral judgment one judge, and one only, were to give the decision of the Court, as is the case in the Privy Council. One incidental good effect of this might possibly be that more of the judgments would be considered and written, when otherwise a judge would only, as a rule, give judgment through the presiding judge.

To return from this digression, the difficulties of the reporter are by no means confined to the judgment; what is called, by courtesy, the argument generally presents more than enough—consisting, as it too often does, of mere strings of cases, bearing more or less on the subject under discussion. This is a vice which seems on the increase—the eager desire for cases may arise from defective training, from that training which consists in accumulating materials, and neglects the faculty of applying them—or it may arise from the too often repeated demand from the Bench for authority, or from a mistaken notion that it is impossible to comply with such a demand without citing a case. Whatever the reason, the substitution of cases for argument is a matter that every beginner will do well to avoid, as he is sure to do if he takes for his models the ablest, not necessarily the most successful, leaders at either Bar. Some one may be inclined to ask what advice to beginners has to do with reporting. Indirectly it has a great deal to do with the subject, since the better the argument the easier the duty of the reporter, and the better, if he has any head on his shoulders, his report. It is in the interest of the future generation of reporters, and, therefore, of the future generation of lawyers, that this advice is given. It has been said that an artist can put no more intellect into his picture of a sitter than he himself possesses. Whether this is an extreme case or not, it applies, in a great measure, to this subject. A man must understand what goes on before him before he can interpret it for the benefit of others. This may be one reason for the assertion sometimes made that shorthand is the reverse of advantageous to reporters. Except when the familiarity with the symbols used is perfect some portion of the mind is diverted from the subject to the symbol. Where there is no such perfect familiarity, that undercurrent of the mind which is engaged in adapting or assimilating each word or idea as it is uttered to those that preceded it is broken in upon and diverted to the mere mechanical process of translating the word or idea into the symbol which is to represent it. It may be said, on the other hand, that the art of a reporter is to accumulate materials which he may arrange at a future time; but this is not the whole truth. Unless there are qualities of mind which enable him to take in at the time all the ideas and views presented, his ultimate report will be a mere congeries of other people's ideas taken down in and reproduced from a note-book, instead of the living resultant of the whole, fresh from his own mind. Probably, therefore, those reports are best in which there is no attempt to produce verbatim arguments, and in which the remarks or dicta of the judges are seldom to be found. The great difficulty of reports is in the head-note. Here the power or weakness of the reporter displays itself to anyone who will institute a comparison between the case as reported and the epitome of it which is termed the head-note. It may happen that a reporter may perfectly understand a case, and yet be unable to express the pith and essence of it shortly in a manner that is intelligible and clear; but this power is essential to good reporting, and is nearly as important as the accuracy, which is the first essential. As a rule the device of calling in the aid of the letters of the alphabet to explain the relative positions of the parties is an indication of the want of this power, though of course this rule is not of universal application.

Written or considered judgments of the Courts greatly facilitate the duties of a reporter, and relieve him of much responsibility, containing, as they do in general, statements of the facts on which each judgment is founded, and the arguments on which reliance is placed. From the nature of things the required head-note may frequently be found in the words of the judgment re-produced verbatim, and in such cases the task of reporting is of the easiest. This ought not to be advanced as an argument in favour of such judgments; but on other grounds it is much to be regretted that Courts do not, much more frequently than at present, take time to consider, or which is every bit as important, to express their judgment. It is not given to every one, not even to all judges, to express happily, and without vagueness or irrelevancy, his or their views on a question of fact depending on evidence and capable of hours of argument pro and con. It is certainly not easier where the matter is one of law, great as is the power of our judges, especially that most striking power of summing up evidence which many of them possess. Any shorthand writer's note of an oral judgment in banco would convince an impartial mind that there was, to say the least, danger of falling into the mistakes we have mentioned. Rapid dispatch of business is a great point, but it may sometimes be bought too dearly, and there is no disrespect to the Bench in saying that all should welcome any indication of a determination on the part of the Courts to deliver written instead of oral judgments wherever the importance of the matter warrants, or rather demands, this extra trouble, and not as now, only in those cases the solution of which is not apparent at the time, or in which there appears at the hearing to be a difference of opinion among the presiding judges.

With respect to the cases reported, the tendency is rather to report too many than too few cases. It requires both energy and independence to refuse, on your own responsibility, to report a case on the ground that it is of no importance, where another reporter takes a different view, and where the boundary line is often rather fine. In short, it is easy to find reasons why a case should be reported, and the result is too many cases which cannot be noted up. Noting up is no bad test of the value of a report.

It is obvious that with these difficulties and these requirements reporting—that is, good reporting—is no easy task. That the work can be got through on conditions much less exigent than those we have indicated is true enough, and is also plain from the unequal nature of the reports themselves; but an attempt has been made to indicate the standard at which those who intend to report—either for any reports or for their own instruction and exercise—should aim, and the standard which the profession should require. The occupation is one that forms an admirable training, but it is not perhaps of so inviting a nature that many without the sense of responsibility that attaches to reporting officially will find they have perseverance or energy to go through with it.

The reader must be left to point what moral there is in these remarks for themselves. Examples are obviously out of the question, but as good reporting is of vital importance not only to lawyers but to legislators, who should know what the existing law is before they supplement it with new law, some service will have been done if the profession have been in any way assisted in arriving for themselves at a conclusion of what does or what does not constitute a good report.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE JURISDICTION OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—In my last letter on the Jurisdiction of the County Courts, I pointed out in some detail the manifold incongruities which have been introduced into the system by successive changes of the law, and I certainly stated more than enough to prove that it was impossible, with any show of legislative consistency or common sense, to let matters remain as they are. There is no need to travel far in search of the cause of these anomalies. When, in 1846, the county courts, in their modern form, were established, the object of the experiment was to get rid of the abuses which clung, like burrs, to the old courts of request, and to set on foot a simple, cheap, and uniform mode of procedure for the recovery of "small debts and demands." A claim of £20 at common law was the limit of the jurisdiction; the judges—I speak in all respect for those able functionaries—were not, at least as a rule, selected from the leading members of the profession; the salaries were insufficient to tempt from even the back benches of Westminster Hall rising talent of a high order; and, in short, the tribunals were expected, if they were not intended, to become useful, hardworking, but somewhat "low" machines for evolving a rough and ready justice. The system came into operation, and no sooner was the gear put into good order than it was found to work smoothly, steadily, and well. The suitors appeared satisfied, and the public was loud in its praise. Confidence, which is proverbially "a plant of slow growth in an aged bosom," found, indeed, no congenial soil in the breasts of our venerable judges, who, from time to time, were wont to excite the merriment of the bar by levelling playful taunts at "county court justice;" but these very taunts were caught up by the public as indications of the way the wind was blowing, and "outsiders" were induced to suppose that tribunals used as whetstones for judicial wit must possess some dangerous merit. Men began to ask why functionaries, who were found to give satisfaction in small matters, might not be entrusted safely with trials of more importance; and they even had the hardihood to doubt whether special pleading, which was ignored in the local courts, was really of the essence of wisdom. Ominous questions of this revolutionary nature were actually heard in the House of Lords as coming from the lips of the most eminent ex-Chancellors, and what is more, they received no satisfactory answer from any quarter. What wonder, then, that the county court, after the experience of a few years, was deemed a success? Like the tribe of Issachar, it was the "strong ass crouching down between two burdens," and almost every young legislator for the last fifteen or twenty years has thought that he was doing good service by heaping on its broad shoulders some additional load. No attempt at method, or system, or consistency was made, for unfortunately, in these days, there is no Minister of Justice, and consequently, every member of Parliament does that which is right in his own eyes. Anomalies are sown broadcast, and the country reaps its reward.

I have gone into these details respecting the rise and progress of the county court system, because they appear to me to furnish the best answer to the question of the Judicature Commissioners, whether it be desirable to lessen the jurisdiction of the county courts. That jurisdiction is now more than double what it originally was at common law, while a large jurisdiction in equity, admiralty, and bankruptcy proceedings has been conferred on the courts. Able judges have been appointed, the salaries have been largely augmented, the business has greatly increased, and there is not the slightest indication of any withdrawal of confidence in the courts on the part of the public. On the contrary, they now probably stand higher in popular favour than they ever have done, and he must be a bold man who, in the face of these facts, should paraphrase the language of the statesman, and declare, that, in his opinion, "the power of the county courts had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished." In my judgment the remedy for the anomalies, which I pointed out in my last letter, must be sought for in the opposite direction; and I now, therefore, proceed, with some diffidence, to furnish a rough sketch of the sort of plan which I think ought to be adopted. In the first place, I consider that the quasi exclusive jurisdiction of the county courts is in a very unsatisfactory state, since the law still recognizes a wide distinction between actions of tort and actions on contract. Prior to the year 1867 a man who recovered in a superior court less than £20 in an action on contract was deprived of costs, unless the judge certified in his favour; but in actions of tort a verdict for £5 carried costs. As this was shown to be a gross abuse, and to be productive of serious evils, a clause was inserted, I believe by Mr. Justice Lush, in the County Court Act of that year, which—leaving the law as to contracts in its original state—fixed the limit of damages which would carry costs in actions of tort at £10 instead of £5. The alteration, as far as it went, was highly valuable, and no doubt it has put a stop to a large number of vexatious and speculative actions. Still, it is open to the grave objection that it does not go nearly far enough. No sensible reason can be urged why any distinction should exist between torts and contracts. Since the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, the boundary line between actions founded on tort and those on contract has been well nigh obliterated. A man detains his neighbour's goods, and an action in the superior court is the consequence. Is this detinue or trover? If the former, he will not recover costs unless the property be worth £20; if the latter, he cannot be deprived of them, should the jury consider the property as worth £10. An action against a carrier for the loss of a parcel furnishes another instance where the right to costs may depend on the skill of the pleader. But without alluding further to such suits as these, I confidently maintain that actions on tort do not in any respect involve more difficult points of law than actions on contract, and that any lawyer who can deal with the one form of action will be equally competent to deal with the other. I propose, then, that the limit of exclusive jurisdiction should be made the same in either form of action, and I further propose that that limit should be fixed at £40 instead of at £20. Were the law thus modified, the judges at Westminster would be enabled to give their undivided attention to matters of real importance, while the interests of the poorer suitors would in no respect be compromised, inasmuch as every county court judge is now empowered in any case before him to grant an appeal, should he consider that course desirable (see 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 13).

In the event of the above change in the law being adopted it would become necessary to amend the Admiralty Jurisdiction Act of last year, and to confine the exclusive jurisdiction of the county courts under that statute to cases where the claim did not exceed £40. It might also, for the sake of conformity, be desirable to modify the jurisdiction of the county courts in cases of equity, so as to confer exclusive authority on those tribunals where the value of the property in dispute should not exceed £40; but, perhaps, this amendment would not be considered of very serious import, as few sane lawyers would advise a suit in the High Court of Chancery, unless the estate in question far exceeded in value the sum just named. Of course, in bankruptcy proceedings the limit of jurisdiction under discussion would be wholly inapplicable; but, even here, I may be permitted to doubt the wisdom of forcing all local bankruptcies into the county court, however large the estate may be, and however complicated may be the rights and liabilities of the different parties. It certainly seems impolitic to compel any persons to institute legal proceedings which must terminate in an appeal; and I am strongly inclined to hold that, in all cases where the property to be distributed under a bankruptcy is likely to exceed £5,000 or, at least, £10,000, an option should be given to the parties interested of commencing proceedings in the London Bankruptcy Court.

In my next letter I will explain my views with respect to the concurrent jurisdiction of the county courts.

"REMITTED CAUSES" IN THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—A Metropolitan County Court Judge, in his letter in your last impression, has forcibly exposed the anomalies in the present system of remitting causes from the superior courts to the county courts. I trust that he will before long give us some information as to the fate of the "remitted" cases when they get into the county court. Having had occasion recently to attend a Metropolitan County Court as counsel in a remitted cause, I am somewhat anxious to know whether my experience is a common one. From the time of my arrival at two o'clock, the hour named by the registrar in the notice sent by him to the parties, until my release about five o'clock, every person to whom I mentioned my errand, from the judge, the registrar, and the habitual practitioners in the court down to the ushers, immediately remarked, "Oh, a remitted cause," in a tone of the profoundest pity for my ignorance in imagining that it could possibly be taken that day. The registrar courteously explained that the proper work of the court was as much as could be got through, and that they were quite overwhelmed by the number of causes remitted. The learned judge (a deputy, acting during the illness of the regular judge) had already sat several extra days, and I understood that he had to sit at a different court the next day. In the result my case stood over until a day late in January, long after it might have been tried if it had remained in the superior court. From the state of things at five o'clock when the list for the day was not nearly finished, and a case was being called on in which the parties were complaining that it was the second day on which they had attended, I fancy that many of the county court cases proper must have met with the same fate. I have much reason to think that the trial in the county court of the cause to which I have referred will ultimately cost as much money as well as more time and trouble to the parties than it would have if left in the superior court.

On my suggesting that the state of things I found existing ought to be made public, I was told that remonstrances had been addressed time after time to the Treasury, and other quarters. Would it not be well to address them to the authorities at Judge's chambers? While the judges and masters continue to remit causes on the barest suggestion of a jurisdiction to do so, and the judges continue to refuse to give costs by certifying that cases are fit for the superior court, even when they so far distrust their own judgment as to reserve points for the consideration of the court in banco, as I have known to be the case, can anything be expected but a block up in the county courts, as bad as there has occasionally been in the superior courts?

A JUNIOR BARRISTER.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. S. BOTELER BRISTOWE, of the Midland Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Newark. Mr. Bristowe was called to the Bar in 1848, and for some time was on the staff of the Weekly Reporter.

Mr. WILLIAM BROOKS MORTIMER, solicitor, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, has been appointed Registrar of the Newcastle County Court, in succession to Mr. John Clayton, resigned. The salary of the office is £8,000 a-year. Mr. Mortimer was certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1856.

Mr. SIMON DUNNING, solicitor, of Parliament-street, Westminster, has been appointed Legal Secretary to Dr. Wilberforce, the new Bishop of Winchester, recently translated from Oxford to that diocese. Mr. Dunning, who was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1837, is a member of the firm of Burder & Dunning.

Mr. HENRY BERNARD, solicitor, of Wells, has been appointed Legal Secretary to the Right Rev. Lord Arthur Hervey, the newly-consecrated Bishop of the diocese of Bath and Wells. Mr. Bernard's certificate as a solicitor was issued in Hilary Term, 1838.

Mr. GEORGE GILL MOUNSEY, notary of Carlisle, has been appointed Legal Secretary to the Right Rev. Harvey Goodwin, D.D., the newly-consecrated Bishop of Carlisle. Mr. Mounsey began his legal career in Easter Term, 1818, and has been secretary to several successive Bishops of Carlisle; he also fills the office of registrar of the diocese.

Mr. RALPH ROBERT WHEELER LINGEN, barrister-at-law, now the secretary to the Committee of Council on Education, has been appointed permanent Secretary to the Treasury, in succession to the Right Hon. G. A. Hamilton, who becomes (in conjunction with the Right Hon. Judge Lawson, of the Irish bench, and Viscount Monck, a member of the Commission to settle the affairs of the Irish Church, which will be constituted at the beginning of the new year. Mr. Lingen is the only son of Mr. Thomas Lingen, of Birmingham, where he was born in 1819. Mr. Lingen was, in 1837, elected from the Bridgnorth Grammar School to an open scholarship at Trinity College, Oxford. He gained the "Ireland" scholarship in 1838, and in the following year the "Hertford"; in 1840 he obtained a first-class in Literis Humanioribus. He was elected to a fellowship at Balliol College in 1841, on taking his M.A. degree, together with Mr. Edward Kent Karslake, Q.C.; and in 1843, Mr. Lingen obtained the Chancellor's prize for a Latin essay, the subject of which was, "The Effect and Influence of the Public Games on the Grecian and Roman Character." In 1846 he was awarded the Eldon law scholarship, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in May of the following year. He entered the public service in 1846, being then employed by the Education Department to conduct an inquiry in South Wales; he afterwards became examiner in the same department, and on the retirement of Sir J. P. Kay-Shuttleworth with a baronetcy, he was appointed to succeed that gentleman as Secretary to the Committee of Council on Education. Mr. Lingen will enter on his duties as Secretary to the Treasury on the 1st of January next.

Mr. FRANCIS M. BOWBY, solicitor, of Sunderland, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking affidavits to be used in the superior courts at Westminster.

Mr. HENRY CIPRIANI POTTER, of Romsey, Southampton, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. SAMUEL PRESTON, solicitor, of Hinckley, Leicestershire, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery, and also a commissioner for taking affidavits in the Superior Courts at Westminster.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

At a meeting of the managing committee, held on Wednesday, the 8th December, 1869, Mr. Edward Lawrance, the Chairman of the Association, in the chair, it was, on the motion of Mr. Stephen Williams, seconded by Mr. E. Benham, resolved—"That the 29th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, having rendered solicitors competent, as trustees in bankruptcy, to contract to be paid a certain sum, by way of percentage or otherwise, as a remuneration for their services as such trustees, including all professional services, the managing committee is of opinion that it would not be inconsistent with the standing of the profession for solicitors to accept such office upon such terms or arrangements as they may see fit in each particular case."

THE UNION OF THE TWO BRANCHES OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION CONSIDERED WITH A SPECIAL REFERENCE TO CONTEMPLATED LAW REFORMS.*

The most characteristic feature of the present age is perhaps that spirit of free and unfettered inquiry which probes remorselessly the origin and claims of the most cherished institutions and beliefs.

Under its influence it is no longer sufficient for any system to appeal to antiquity or prescription for its retention; if it cannot give a good account of itself on its own merits the most venerable antiquity, a prescription of many centuries will not save it from adverse criticism and consequent destruction.

It is no wonder therefore, that attention should have been drawn to our complex judicial organization, hitherto regarded by many even intelligent laymen in the light of a mysterious cobweb, full of traps and entanglements, carefully preserved intact by the lawyers for their own peculiar benefit at the expense of the laity—and we must all admit that it is full time that public attention should be drawn to this subject; for, although we look back with amused wonder at the days now past when those mythic legal familiars, John Doe and Richard Roe haunted our courts with their imaginary feud, and when the mysteries of fines and recoveries, rebutters and surrebutters flourished to the "no small gain" of "the craftsmen," and plume ourselves on the fact that we are not as our fathers were—the ministering priests to such absurdities as these, yet there is much in our present laws, and particularly in that administration of them in which we take a principal part, that will not bear the rude touch of hostile questioning, but will fall to pieces at the first assault.

That our present complicated and expensive judicial organization has lasted so long is due principally to that want of scientific education on the part of the profession which has been so ably stated by Mr. Jevons of Liverpool, in the pamphlet which has excited so much interest in the profession, supplemented by the constitutional indifference and distrust with which all theoretical changes are viewed in this country, not merely by the profession, but by the general public, especially when such changes are not initiated by persons of the highest professional or political rank, for as it was wittily put by the Times the other day, in an article somewhat to the purpose, "a Bentham may demonstrate, but unless a Lord Chancellor nod approval nothing will be done," and unfortunately, of course, not merely Lord Chancellors, but all those exalted persons whose high standing and proved practical sagacity would give the required weight to any measures of legal reform are so occupied by the pressure of their daily work that with them practice leaves no time for theory.

Notwithstanding, however, these impediments in the way of legal reform there are now indications of forthcoming changes, which if properly matured and carried out will go far towards simplifying our judicial system and redeeming it from many of those blots and abuses which are a scandal to the jurisprudence of a civilized community.

* A paper read by Mr. C. T. Saunders, solicitor, of Birmingham, at the annual meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, held at York, on the 19th October, 1869.

I allude, of course, to the Report of the recent Judicature Commission which is, no doubt, familiar to all present, and which has probably been read by many, as it was by myself, with some disappointment, but still with considerable hope. That Commission, I cannot refrain from saying in passing, is a memorable event to our long-proscribed caste, for there sat upon it, as her Majesty's trusty and well-beloved commissioners, two country attorneys, Mr. Bateson and Mr. Lowndes, worthily representing that important city whose attorneys have exhibited so much public spirit and energy in their endeavours both to improve our legal system, and also to elevate the profession.

Let us now consider the leading features of the really revolutionary changes which the Royal Commissioners agree in suggesting for adoption. Fruitful amongst the causes which have cast discredit on our judicial system has been the severance of jurisdiction into the two great divisions of law and equity, long the wonder of foreign jurists, but the necessity for which was until lately considered as cardinal a point of belief as the separation into two distinct branches of the professors of both law and equity.

The enormous evils produced by this conflict of legal and equitable jurisdictions, the misery and ruin in which it has involved generations of unhappy suitors having been long the theme of satirists and novelists, have at last found grave and serious expression in the Judicature Commissioners' Report, which, recognising and adopting the principle laid down by their predecessors in 1850 that "a consolidation of all the elements of a complete remedy in the same court is obviously desirable, not to say imperatively necessary, to the establishment of a consistent and rational system of procedure," boldly recommends the complete fusion of the two jurisdictions.

Less mischievous in practice from their virtually concurrent jurisdiction, but perhaps even more indefensible in theory is the separate existence of the several Superior Courts of Common Law, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, those fossil remains of a primeval legal age, the continuation of which, although not productive of the gigantic evils attendant upon the separation of law and equity is still full of minor but collectively very serious inconveniences.

Following, however, in the wake of, and as an almost necessary accompaniment to, the foregoing organic reform, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer are—if the recommendations of the Commissioners be carried out—to disappear as separate courts, although it is fondly supposed by the eminent persons forming the Commission that the country is so much attached to these venerable names that the shock would be too great to part with them at once (excess of joy it is said is as fatal as excess of sorrow), and, therefore, they propose to keep their memories green in conjunction with the still more fragrant name of Chancery by converting the same courts into so many chambers or divisions of one supreme court. Better by far bury them and the miseries of which they have been the fruitful cause, far out of our own and our children's sight and, if possible, memories for ever.

The above two great reforms—the fusion of law and equity and the consolidation of all the superior courts of law, including the separate jurisdictions of Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty are distinctly recommended, but on two subjects, only second in importance, I mean the Nisi Prius and Circuit System and the Law of Appeals, the Commissioners speak with a somewhat uncertain voice in consequence of the limited extent of their Commission. A fresh Commission has, however, since been issued with powers comprehensive enough to entertain these questions, and it is important that such an association as this should exercise its legitimate influence upon their deliberations.

The opinion of the public, and, I may say I believe, of the principal law societies—certainly the Provincial Law Societies—upon these two undetermined, but most important, subjects, has been already expressed, and with a general unanimity in favour of the following changes as essential to complete any scheme of large and comprehensive reform in our judicature system. They are—

Firstly. The establishment of Provincial Courts of the First Instance throughout the country with districts assigned to them, after the manner of the existing District Bankruptcy or Probate Courts, having their head quarters or registries for the issue of all processes and filing of pleadings, hearing of all applications for time or otherwise in the great centres of population, presided over by judges of the first eminence and with competent registrars, the judges to be either locally situate as the Bankruptcy Commissioners and county court judges are, or, better still, perhaps, itinerant and holding at least quarterly sittings at the most important towns within each district, and having jurisdiction in all cases not within the present enforced limits of the county courts jurisdictions. This plan, or the outline of it, is indeed suggested as an alternative one in a joint note to the aforesaid Report signed by Mr. Justice Smith and the present Solicitor-General, Sir J. D. Coleridge, and it would be preferable to the other plan which has been mooted—viz., that of increasing the jurisdiction of the County Courts, so as to embrace all subjects of litigation, whatever the amount at stake, unless the constitution and mode of procedure in such courts were remodelled; and it is also preferable to the plan of establishing what the Commissioners call a supreme court, whose head quarters would be in London, and whose judges would go circuits somewhat after the present manner, but at more frequent intervals, although even with this plan provincial registries might, after the manner of the district registries of the Probate Court, be still secured.

If the country, and particularly the commercial part of the community, were but alive to the vast saving of time and money which would result from localising the various proceedings in an action from writ to execution, instead of it being necessary as at present to take every step, however unimportant, in the metropolis, it would not be long before the present utterly absurd and indefensible system went the way of the many other legal anomalies which have succumbed to the assault of common sense.

Secondly. The establishment of one final court of appeal composed of judges generally, but not necessarily, promoted for distinguished judicial eminence from the courts below.

Our present law of appeal is at once irrational in theory and ruinous in practice, but its inconsistent and absurd anomalies are now so generally acknowledged that it is unnecessary for me to detail them.

Such being the main features of the startling reforms which we may shortly expect—for events move very rapidly in these days—what will be their effect upon the profession itself?

It will evidently work a revolution in the bar.

In the first place, there will be an end at once to the distinction which exists between the common law and equity bar. Each advocate must have that general knowledge which will enable him to plead in all cases before the courts, and to qualify himself for a seat on that judicial bench, where he will have to adjudicate upon all litigated subjects alike.

Secondly. The localising of all litigation, except appeals, will oblige the bar to break up that central organization which has been the mainstay of their power and influence, and settle down in batches in the country towns or else abandon the courts of the first instance to the attorneys, as they have been obliged to do the bankruptcy and county courts and confine themselves to the courts of appeal.

But is it probable when the public attention, excited by such changes as these, is directed to the subject that the present artificial division of the profession into two branches, which has been a part of the old order of things, and which has had some warrant for its existence in the equally artificial divisions of the system under which it has flourished, will continue any longer to exist?

The subject is one of great interest, and has been brought, during the past twelve months, into more prominent notice and discussion than it has ever yet been, by reason of the outspoken and decided views of so high an authority as Mr. Justice Hannen, and the movement consequent thereon in the profession, and the comments of the public press; and men inside, and outside too, of the profession are, in the general upheaval of the foundations of our judicial organisation, beginning to ask on what foundation does the Bar monopoly rest, sole remaining relic as it is, of those curious trade guilds, the protection and exclusive privileges of which, once considered so necessary, have long since been condemned by truer principles of political economy as radically bad and inconsistent with the public good, and the first time the question is asked in the proper place, it is elicited that there is no legal foundation whatever for it, but that the whole superstructure rests upon the custom of the courts, and legal etiquette. I allude, of course, to the reply of the Home Secretary to the questions put by Mr. Fawcett and others in the House of Commons, when the Overend and Gurney prosecution was on the point of being abandoned through the stringent influence of the existing rules, whereby Mr. Lewis, undeniably the fittest man for the work, was barred from the further conduct of the case.

Can there be a doubt that a privileged institution, having no better foundation than this, would have long since disappeared, but for the circumstance that those most interested in its maintenance have always held paramount influence in the Legislature. And when the range of vision is extended from the narrow limits of our island to the practices of other nations, what do we find? This striking fact, that in no other civilised country but one, is there any approach to such a system, and in none a counterpart to it, that in Sweden and Denmark; throughout the length and breadth of Germany in all its separate governments; in Italy, Spain, and Portugal, the functions of the attorney and the advocate are combined; and that in France, the only apparent exception, the relations of the advocate to the avocat (who, to only a partial extent occupies the position of an attorney) and to the client differs in those points which are considered essential in our system; and more striking still, that in the vast empire of the United States, governed by English laws, filled by our own race, and holding many of our legal traditions; and in all our colonial dependencies, no such severance of the two branches of the profession exists.

Now, in the face of these facts, which lie at the very threshold of the argument, what are the reasons which are considered to justify the maintenance of this peculiar and anomalous system?

The most striking argument, and the one that has been most persistently advanced in its favour, is the alleged necessity for a division of labour, and the superior excellence in special knowledge attained thereby, as evidenced by the severance of the common law and chancery bar and the status of the pure conveyancer.

Now, I do not deny that this argument is one possessing considerable weight, but its importance has been much overrated, and the approaching fusion of law and equity will probably soon deprive it of its most forcible illustration, for the distinction between the common law and chancery barristers must then necessarily cease.

As concerns the pure conveyancer who never goes into court there is no appreciable difference between him and a high class conveyancing attorney who never issues a writ, and the genus will exist alike under either system: his status may, however, be noticed for the example which it affords of the convenience of extending the right of audience before the courts to all branches of the profession whether specially devoted to advocacy or not. A Joshua Williams, for example, would probably be dismayed at the prospect of undertaking the examination of a difficult witness, but he is brought down to Westminster with great effect to argue an abstruse point of real property law. The common law and chancery bar being merged, there will remain, as the only important division of labour, that which exists between the advocate generally and the attorney—i.e., between the person who prepares the case for trial and the person who conducts it in court, and it is gravely asserted that there is such a vital difference between the qualities of mind required for the two operations that they must be kept separate. The Pall Mall Gazette, in the best article that I have yet seen on the other side of the question, goes so far as to say that no two pursuits relating to the same subject can well be more distinct than advocacy and getting up a case for trial. Now, of course, a man may have the perseverance, shrewdness, and tact required for skillfully getting up a difficult case for trial, and may be, notwithstanding, very deficient in the qualities required to form a good advocate, but, on the other hand, he may just as likely as not have the gift of advocacy sufficiently developed in him to enable him to conduct the case to the end with effect; and so far from the pursuits being irreconcilable, it would seem to an ordinary understanding not affected by the inevitable bias of professional usage, that to conduct a case at the trial is the natural and legitimate sequence to superintending or personally directing its course up to that period.

But it has been said, and with some force, that there will necessarily be many cases in which the practitioner, however well qualified to get up the case, will not have the advocate's quality developed, and that in such cases he must entrust the case to another who is so gifted, and that then there will be the same division of labour as at present, with some objections from which the present system is free.

Now, in considering this fair retort, it will be convenient to inquire how the profession would be likely to shape itself to the altered practice consequent upon amalgamation—probably as follows: there would be a greater tendency in practitioners to exclusively devote themselves to litigious or court practice on the one hand, and to conveyancing on the other; and, in passing, I just note that inasmuch as court practice would be the most frequent avenue to distinction the highest class of practitioners, the most gifted in intellectual power, would devote themselves to it, and there would be a greater development of partnership arrangements by which different classes of practice would be conducted, as in fact they so frequently are now, by different partners, and which in the event of the common law partner being unqualified for advocacy would include within the firm a partner who was so qualified.

Even the Inns of Court Commissioners of 1855 had a glimmering suspicion that such an obvious and sensible arrangement would be far more convenient for the public, for in examining Mr. Cookson, after referring to the improved education of the attorneys and the defective education of the bar, they proceeded to question him as to the propriety of the present division of labour, and on his replying that he believed that if the profession were united, one man would devote himself to court practice and another to conveyancing, &c., they proceeded to ask him "Would not that be a much more eligible arrangement for the client than the present, according to which a solicitor, however gifted, cannot transact the most common matter of business in court without calling in the aid of a person perhaps less educated than himself?" and on Mr. Cookson remarking that it would not be possible for the same practitioner to practice extensively in both branches, they press the point still closer by suggesting "Might not it be done by means of partnerships, one partner taking the court business, and the other the chancery business?" This is the successfully adopted practice throughout the vast English-speaking, English-law-governed United States of America.

Two American lawyers gave evidence before the same Inns of Court Commissioners of the working of this system, and I will quote from the answers of one of them a passage which should re-assure the minds of those who so strenuously support the separate existence of the bar, on the ground of the division of labour. He says—"There are many eminent men of legal knowledge who have devoted themselves to the business of conveyancing who never appear in court at all, but who may appear where they please; then there are others who do nothing but appear in court constantly; and there are men of large legal attainments who remain in their offices all the time, and prepare the cases for others, so that practically the bar divides itself to suit the circumstances of the case, although the lines are not so distinctly marked out as if they were recognised by law."

That this blending of both branches of the profession in America does not lower either the social status or the legal excellence of the profession is abundantly clear. The observations of Sir Charles Lyell on this point were read before this Association many years ago by Mr. Edwin Field in one of his formidable raids on the bar monopoly, but they are so important that I must give an extract from them:—He says, "The profession of the law is, of all others in the United States, that which attracts to it the greatest number of able and highly educated men. Practically there is much the same subdivision of labour in the legal profession here as in England. There are, however, no two grades here corresponding to barrister and attorney. Every lawyer in the United States may plead in court and address a jury; and, if he be successful, may be raised to the bench; but he must qualify as a counsellor in order to be entitled to plead in the supreme courts, where cases are heard involving points at issue between the tribunals of independent States." (This is now no longer the case I believe.) The line drawn between barrister and attorney in Great Britain, which never existed even in colonial times, in Massachusetts, could only be tolerated in a country where the aristocratic element is exceedingly predominant. In the English Church where seats in the House of Lords are held by bishops, we see how the rank of a whole profession may be elevated by making high distinctions, conferred only on a few, open to all. That in like manner the highest honours of the bar and bench might be open without detriment to the most numerous class of legal practitioners in Great Britain seems to be proved by the fact, that occasionally some attorneys of talent, by quitting their original line of practice and starting anew, can attain the highest rank. And when we consider the confidential nature of the business transacted by English attorneys; the extent of property committed to their charge; the manner in which they are consulted in family affairs of the utmost delicacy, as in the forming of marriage contracts and wills; we may well question the policy of erecting an artificial line of demarcation between them and the advocates, marked enough to depress their social rank, and to deter many young men of good families, who can best afford to obtain a liberal education, from entering in reality the most important branch of the profession."

We may, therefore, I think, assume that, as regards conveyancing, which, however, is rather beside my subject, there would be the same class of exclusive practitioners as is now represented by the conveyancer at or under the bar, and the pure conveyancing attorney, and with no diminution in, at all events, a sufficiently profound knowledge of real property law to carry on the conveyancing business of the county with success. With regard to court practice as a rule, with for the present considerable, but in the future rare, exceptions, that would be undertaken by the same practitioner from the issue of the writ to the trial and concluding process, and in the majority of those cases in which the advocacy in court was severed, the same would be undertaken by another member of the firm. In the remaining cases an advocate would be retained, and the only objection I have heard to this branch of the argument is, the narrow and supremely selfish one, that a single practitioner who cannot plead in court may have to appear in an unfair light to his client when contrasted with his more gifted brother, who the next time an action has to be tried for the same client, may seduce him from his proper allegiance.

Of course there will be clients as now—half of us in the room have such,—who will go to a young and active common law man for their writs and trials, and to a staid conveyancing man for their wills and purchase-deeds, and if they are so unfortunate as to require it, to a clever bankruptcy practitioner to arrange their affairs; but this will cut all ways, and work no disadvantage in the long run; and if there were anything in the point it is unworthy of being raised in the discussion of such a question as this.

My reply, therefore, to the retort that there would exist the same division of labour as now, and that it would be accompanied by objections not existing now, is first, that the division of labour would be principally confined to the difference between court practice and conveyancing, which in the face of the existing division at the bar between the same practitioners, could not be held to require or warrant the existence of separate orders; secondly, that the functions of the advocate and the preparer of the case for trial not being in their essence incongruous, but ordinarily and most naturally co-existent, the difference between them would to a great extent cease when the bar was thrown open and a career of distinction opened up to the successful practitioner, and that the successful union of the two qualities and duties in the same person must be more beneficial to the suitor, both as being more conducive to the successful conduct of the case to the end, as also from being necessarily far less expensive in actual cost, and far more advantageous in point of economy of time, and, lastly, that in the remaining cases, the severance of the two functions would present no practical difficulty.

Is it not more rational, therefore, to have no such artificial barrier as that which exists between the advocate and the attorney, but to leave it to the process of natural selection to determine the employment of another person to conduct the trial, either instead of, or jointly with, the one who has worked it up and made it his own up to that point, for "there is between the duties of an advocate and attorney," in Mr. Justice Hannen's own judicial words, "no sharp dividing line; the duties merge into one another; and a man who begins his career does not know until he has been practising for years for what he may have the greatest fitness"; and I believe, to continue his language, that "it would be well to leave it to a man to find out the opportunities that may arise of calling forth the particular qualities and talents that are in him, and so leave it to such occasions to develop whether or not he has a better opportunity for carrying on the business of a solicitor than the profession of an advocate."

And now having examined, and I hope disposed of this apparently formidable argument of the division of labour, let us consider another argument which has been advanced in opposition to the amalgamation with scarcely less confidence as one affecting the purity of the administration of justice.

It is urged that the attorney having been engaged in the case from the commencement has too great an interest in it to treat it in that serene and philosophic manner which is alone proper and decorous in the superior courts of law, and that the barrister is often obliged to check the eagerness of the attorney, which sometimes leads him to interfere in the conduct of the case, and I find an old fellow-debater, Mr. Sydney Gedge, of London, in a recent speech at a meeting of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, in commenting upon Mr. Justice Hannen's liberal address of the previous year, arguing that the further the client is removed from the advocate the better, and that he had "seen attorneys shake their fists at each other," but he had "never seen barristers do this," and so on. Now I have, I hope, demonstrated that we have both reason and authority for holding that there is no natural barrier between the functions of the attorney in preparing a case for trial, and the functions of an advocate in conducting it on the trial, and I maintain most unreservedly, and in direct opposition to the objection we are now considering, that if the attorney have the requisite natural qualities for a successful advocate, he is by that very intimate knowledge of the case, from the first, which he alone possesses, from that very personal acquaintance with the actors in the legal drama, the parties, their witnesses, and the whole surroundings and "ins and outs," so to speak, of the case, all the better fitted to conduct it through the stormy waters of the trial, and with a far better chance of successfully voyaging it into a secure haven. Granted that he may be betrayed into indiscretions by his hearty zeal for his client who is to him a living verity, with rights to assert, or wrongs to redress, and whom he cannot look upon as a cold A. B. abstraction,—I say that any such indiscretions or such ebullitions of zeal are drawbacks the most insignificant compared with the unquestionable advantages to which I have referred, and that for one case which has been thereby lost, there have been twenty lost for want at a pinch or sudden turn of the case of that thorough knowledge of its details with which the attorney is saturated, but with which the advocate is necessarily only imperfectly acquainted.

Even in France, the only country in Europe, besides our own, where there is any semblance of the same distinctive orders as with us, the advocate himself examines the parties and their witnesses, and superintends the getting-up of the case, the avocat's part in the proceedings being comparatively slight.

And the light in which this prudish argument is regarded by the legal mind, unbiassed by the exigencies of defending our peculiar institution, is shown by the following extract from a letter which I received some time since from an eminent North German practitioner, Dr. Pavenstaet, of Bremen, who, in answer to my inquiry on this point, after stating the absence of any distinction between the advocate and the anwalt or attorney, says, "We consider it of the first importance, that the client should always communicate direct with the advocate who is to plead for him in court, as instructions transmitted through the medium of a third person, can never be so complete and thorough as those which are given by means of oral communications."

But the principle involved in each of these two important arguments—viz., the necessity for a division of labour between the attorney and the advocate, from the incongruity of their respective functions, and the impropriety of a direct communication between the advocate and the client and witnesses, has been abandoned by the direct act of the Legislature, and without, so far as is known, any evil consequences resulting therefrom. Attorneys are entitled by legislative enactments to act as advocates in the Bankruptcy Courts, in which estates of great magnitude, involving intricate questions of law and fact, are constantly administered, and in which the character, honour, and future prospects in life of individuals are at stake. Has it been found an advantage or not in the discovery of frauds in the unravelling of involved accounts in the interests of public justice generally that a Lawrance or a Linklater has had the opportunity of direct communication with the parties and personal investigation of the facts in a particular case.

By other legislative enactments they are also entitled to plead, and are virtually the sole pleaders in the County Courts with their now manifold jurisdictions? Jurisdiction in actions of contract enforced at the plaintiff's option up to £50, and without limit by consent; a jurisdiction in those most important of all cases, real property actions, up to £20 per annum equivalent to from £400 to £600 in value according to the nature of the property; a jurisdiction in equity up to £500; and still more recently a jurisdiction in admiralty up to £300 in amount; and the statistics of last year disclose the extraordinary fact that while the enormous amount of upwards of two millions and a-half was sued for in these courts in that year, in one half of the Nisi Prius trials, during the same period, the amount at stake did not exceed the £50 county court limit in actions of contract and in only 163 trials did the amount involved exceed £500, the limit of the equity jurisdiction in such courts. The above facts show forcibly how restricted in their application the arguments of the defenders of the present exclusive system have become; the ground is indeed gradually being taken from under their feet, for it surely needs no argument to prove that the principle involved is the same in the cases within as without the county court jurisdiction.

Another objection which has found some supporters and should, therefore, be noticed, is this, that there would not be the same attention paid to the study of the principles of law, and that we should not, therefore, have such great lawyers as heretofore. Now, in the first place, I cannot admit that under the existing system there has been a proper attention paid to the study of the principles of law and jurisprudence. We have had great lawyers it is true, but they have been great in spite, and not in consequence of the existing order of things. But in refutation of the argument that there would be a falling off in the theoretical study of the law and the production of great lawyers, I must, again, point to our brethren in profession and race in the States. Have no great jurists or text writers been produced there? I might enumerate as illustrious a roll of names as during the same period could be exhibited by our own country, and I am justified by the expressed opinion of a great American lawyer that it is to the practical knowledge of the defects of their legal procedure, which many of their eminent men acquired by practising as attorneys, that they owe the earlier introduction of those great reforms in their judicature, which we are even now but dimly apprehending. But, further, and as a final reply to this depressing argument, it cannot be supposed that our present system of legal education will continue. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the subject we are now considering, there is, I hope, but one opinion as to the necessity for establishing a Law University, through whose portals all future students must pass, and by means of which the scientific study of the law will be largely promoted and encouraged.

There is one last practical, although transitory, objection, which I shall notice, and it admits of a short reply.

It is said, on the part of the bar, how unfair it will be to admit the whole body of the attorneys at once to practice on an equality with them. It has been said by some attorneys how unfair it will be to admit the bar without examinations to inundate the country to their probable loss.

There are, I should suppose, upon a fair estimate, about fifteen hundred barristers or one-third of their gross number in the active pursuit of their profession, the rest are either only nominal members of the bar or are filling some of the multitudinous offices at home or abroad open to them. Of these fifteen hundred one-half may be said to have made a recognised position and name, the remaining moiety have not yet done so.

As regards the former the amalgamation would work no injury, the prestige in favour of their well-known names would continue undiminished under the new dispensation. As regards the less fortunate ones, their prospects might suffer, but they would have the great countervailing advantage of being able to practice at large, free, and it must be a great satisfaction to them from what Sir Robert Phillimore called, in his evidence before the Commission of 1855, the malignant influence of the attorneys.

As concerns the attorneys they need not fear the competition of the bar, in what has hitherto been their own peculiar walk. Those men, whose well-known fame alone would be dangerous, will never deign or need to practice anything but pure advocacy. The residue, at the utmost, some one thousand strong, need not, when distributed throughout the country, excite their apprehension.

Concerning the supposed practical inconveniences in the way of carrying out so great a change, these will not, on consideration, be found to present any insuperable difficulty; of course, no great reforms can be carried out without some difficulty and more or less hardship to individuals. In the first place every barrister who has already been called must be admitted to the entire practice of the united profession. I have shown how small a proportion of them will avail themselves of this latitude, and we must concede this point in return for the equally important privilege which must be granted to the attorneys, now on the roll, that of being admitted to the right of pleading in all the superior courts and eligible for all judicial and legal appointments, subject to this exception, which may be made in deference to the supposed inferior acquaintance of attorneys with the principles of law—viz., inasmuch as it will be a work of time to carry out the proposed university and to reap the advantage of its higher legal training, the right of pleading in the supreme court of appeal might be limited to barristers of five years' standing and attorneys of ten years' standing (in Scotland a W. S. of ten years' standing is eligible to the judicial bench), but with this stipulation that the holder of the superior degree of Doctor of Laws in the new university, which will entail severer examinations, may plead at any time; such provisions would effectually fence in the dignity of the highest court; and ensure at once a competent and experienced bar, whether the right of pleading in such court should ultimately be confined to the holders of the highest degree—I need not now discuss.

I have now, I think, exhausted the objections and difficulties both of principle and detail to the proposed amalgamation, and what do they all collectively amount to? are they worthy to be weighed in the balance with the great and unquestionable advantage to the public and the profession, particularly our branch of it, which will result from the amalgamation? I have been already obliged incidentally to refer to some of the points in which the public would be the gainer. And the question from this standpoint is very ably treated by one of the most thoughtful of our periodicals, the Spectator, in a recent article, in which the writer, in speaking of the proposed university for the students of each branch of the profession, without further providing for the amalgamation, contends that it is that which the public interest demands, and referring to the clever but hollow argument in the Pall Mall Gazette, he proceeds:—"The injustice of excluding attorneys from all the chief legal appointments is no doubt felt by them alone, but it is none the less real, and it carries with it a diminution of social status which is a clog upon the whole of that branch of the profession. It is said that the attorney makes up for this by earning money more quickly than the barrister, and that the barrister ought to be rewarded for his early disappointments by 'high patronage late in life.' It might be better if the barrister could also earn money when he was young, and yet there would be no reason why he should forfeit his subsequent chance of patronage. If a man is fit for both, why is he to be restricted to one? Why is he to remain idle in youth, or be incapable of a rise in manhood, unless it be for the public interest that tried ability should not have the stimulus of hope, and growing ability should be pressed down under the load of disappointment, and he concludes—"The real point to be considered is the public interest. Would the legal work of the country be better or worse done if these arbitrary distinctions were abolished? We think it would be done better. Of course a solicitor may feel that he is unfitted to argue a case, just as a barrister may feel that he is unfitted to get up the necessary evidence. But the converse may sometimes occur. An attorney may learn by experience that he is more fitted for work in court than for office work, and a barrister may find that his presence of mind always deserts him as soon as he is on his legs. It is all very well to say that both branches of the profession are open to all the world; but a man who has committed himself to one does not care to throw away all his time and money and start afresh in the other."

And what, lastly, shall I say of its effect on us, what is our present position, and what are our prospects? It is not sufficiently considered how small a part of the legal business of this country is litigious, nor how vast are the interests, how important and numerous the subjects involving legal assistance which are constantly engaging the watchful care and superintendence of the attorneys of this kingdom with comparatively little interference or assistance from the bar; even of litigious matters it is almost incredible how small a proportion proceed to that stage in which the assistance of an advocate is necessary. There were last year alone 900,000 county court summonses, in how many of them would a barrister have been engaged? There were 82,000 writs issued out of the superior courts, but only 2 per cent. went to trial, and necessarily involved the interference of counsel, the remaining 98 per cent. were dealt with and settled by the attorney without any advocacy being called into requisition. The attorney's general education is as good as his professional education is a great deal better than that of the majority of the bar. His influence is scattered broadcast through the land, and is practically unbounded, and yet what are his prospects, of any high advancement! Because by a long series of encroachments, but by no legislative enactments he has been deprived of his ancient privilege of pleading in court, of being a member of the great Inns, in whom such right has by custom become vested; because at the last stage in such of the manifold businesses entrusted to him as require judicial decision, his mouth is stopped and he is obliged to retain a deputy to speak for him, he is excluded from all high legal and judicial appointments; he has before him as a reward of the most diligent study, of the highest legal attainments, no prize or distinction whatever, all these being appropriated by virtue of the exercise of that single function of pleading at the bar of the superior courts by the other branch of the profession. As another able writer of the outside public says in a recent article in the Fortnightly Review, in which the absurdities of the present system are fully exposed:—

"The present arrangement of the legal profession cuts off from a fair career one whole branch of its members, attorneys are allowed to grow rich, but they are allowed no other prize of legal success; there is perhaps no other profession pursued by persons in the position of gentlemen which offers no public prizes as a reward for eminence."

To unite the two branches of the profession, especially when supplemented as it must be by a law university, would be to lift up the attorneys as a body in social status and national importance; it would remove from us that rankling sense of injustice under which we must always otherwise exist.

It would open up the entire profession to the higher classes, who are now deterred from sending their sons into this the most important and by far the most numerous branch, by the existence of those disqualifications for legal and judicial rank of which we now so justly complain. This again would re-act upon and elevate the tone and character of the members of the profession who, having before them as the legitimate reward of ability and hard work the great prizes of the profession, would thereby be stimulated to greater excellence.

There is, therefore, in conclusion, no foundation for the charge that we wish from jealous rivalry to "pull down the bar," as it has been said "to our level," and that by so doing the character and tone of the profession will be lowered; but we do wish, while acknowledging the high and honourable traits of character which have always distinguished the English advocate, and while desirous that the great change shall be made with as much regard as possible to vested interests, to remove an invidious and artificial barrier which equals in rigid exclusiveness the worst form of caste and perpetuates distinctions, the reason and necessity for which have ceased with the improved social and professional status of attorneys, and in seeking to accomplish this end so far from lowering the character of the profession, we believe that by freeing it from the arbitrary rules of an antiquated etiquette, and placing its relations to its own members upon a fair and rational basis, we shall at the same time promote the interests of the public, and enhance the dignity and importance of our learned profession.

OBITUARY.

MR. HENRY JACOBS.

Mr. Henry Jacobs, who had, owing to his great age and infirmities, just resigned the office of Clerk to the Magistrates of the City of Oxford, died there on the 16th December. Mr. Jacobs was originally clerk to Mr. Roberson, Town Clerk of Oxford, and had discharged the duties of magistrates' clerk for upwards of thirty-four years, so that his official career embraced about half a-century. He had likewise filled the office of Clerk to the Oxford Board of Guardians, in conjunction with his other duties, for a period of forty years. His long experience in connection with the administration of criminal law, with which he had a most extensive acquaintance, and his knowledge of the details of the working of the poor law system, rendered him a valuable officer to the two bodies with which he had been so long associated. The chairman of the guardians testified that Mr. Jacobs had always been most anxious to keep down the legal expenses of the board, and few unions could be cited which had been kept so free from law costs. Mr. Jacobs was seventy-nine years of age at the time of his death.

MR. RICHARD THOMPSON.

The death of Mr. Richard Thompson, solicitor, of Durham, and Clerk to the Board of Guardians of that city, took place suddenly on the 13th December, at his residence in Old Elvet, at the age of 59 years. The late Mr. Thompson commenced practice at Durham in 1829, in Michaelmas Term of which year he was certificated as a solicitor, and had been for the last few years Clerk to the Durham Board of Guardians and Assessment Committee. Previously to accepting this office Mr. Thompson had taken an active part in the municipal affairs of Durham, and on one occasion filled the office of Mayor of that city. Since 1869, Mr. Thompson had been in partnership with Mr. William Lisle, the firm being known as Thompson & Lisle.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Michaelmas Term, 1869.

FINAL EXAMINATION

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of 26, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

HENRY SUMMERS SEWELL, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Hoyle, Shipley, & Hoyle, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and Messrs. Hill & Hoyle, of London.

WILLIAM FREDERICK BEARDSLEY, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Tallents, Burnaby, Griffin, & Co., of Newark; and Messrs. De Gex & Harding, of London.

FRANCIS WILLIAM SANCROFT DAMANT, who served his clerkship to Mr. Henry James Damant, of Cowes, Isle of Wight; and Tamworth, Staffordshire.

JOHN RAYNER COOPER, who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Harland, of Bridlington; and Messrs. Lee, Collyer, Bristow, Withers, & Russell, of London.

THEODORE LUMLEY, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Lumley & Lumley, of London.

CHARLES CORNISH BROWN, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Parnell & Brown, of Bristol; and Messrs. Gamlen & Son of London.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following prizes of books:—

To Mr. Sewell, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's-inn.

To Mr. Beardsley, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clement's-inn.

To Mr. Damant, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Lumley, and Mr. Brown, prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The examiners also certified that the following candidates, under the age of 26, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

JOHN SEYMOUR FOWLER, who served his clerkship to Mr. Alexander Burnes Anderson, of Liverpool; and Messrs. Torr, Janeway, & Tagart, of London.

ARTHUR CRANTREE PROCTER, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Edward Procter, of Macclesfield; and Messrs. John & Charles Cole, of London.

EDMUND THEODORE RATCLIFF, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Alcock & Millward, of Birmingham; and Messrs. Torr, Janeway, & Tagart, of London.

HIGSON SIMPSON, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Grange & Wintringham, of Great Grimsby; and Messrs. Belfrage & Middleton, of London.

The council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The examiners further announced to the following candidates that their answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled them to certificates of merit if they had not been above the age of 26:—

WILLIAM BOYCOTT, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Gardner & Landor, of Rugeley.

GEORGE STUART EVETT, B.A., who served his clerkship to Mr. Henry Raper George Fowkes, of London,

ROBERT MARTIN, who served his clerkship to Mr. Sheldon Dudley Ashby, of London.

JAMES MIDGLEY, who served his clerkship to Mr. Richard Ludlam Rooke, of Leeds.

GEORGE PRESSWELL, who served his clerkship to Mr. Jabez McDiarmid, of London.

The examiners also reported that among the candidates from Liverpool in the year 1869, Mr. J. S. Fowler, passed the best examination, and was, in the opinion of the examiners, entitled to honorary distinction; that Mr. M. P. Jones, and Mr. J. W. Alsop, B.A., were respectively second and third in order of merit among the candidates from Liverpool in the year 1869, and were, in their opinion, entitled to honorary distinction.

The council have therefore awarded to Mr. Fowler, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Alsop, respectively, the prize, consisting of a gold medal, founded by Mr. Timpron Martin, of Liverpool.

The gold medal founded by Mr. John Atkinson, for candidates from Liverpool or Preston, who have shown themselves best acquainted with the Law of Real Property and the Practice of Conveyancing, has been also awarded to Mr. Fowler, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Alsop respectively. (The prizes awarded to Mr. Jones, and Mr. Alsop were withheld in the years 1867 and 1868.)

The examiners also reported that among the candidates from Birmingham in the year 1869, Mr. E. T. Ratcliff was entitled to honorary distinction.

The council have accordingly communicated this report to the Birmingham Law Society.

Mr. Courtney Stanhope Kenny, having, among the candidates in the year 1869, shewn himself best acquainted with the Law of Real Property and the Practice of Conveyancing, the council have awarded to him the prize, consisting of a gold medal, founded by Mr. Francis Broderip, of Lincoln's Inn.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 120; of these 113 passed and 7 were postponed.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

There is not much doing in any of the markets, Consols and foreign securities are rather flat, railways showed some animation at the beginning of the week, but soon subsided. The discount demand is, as usual, at this time of year, brisk. The guaranteed Indian railway stocks continue at low quotations, considering the near approach of the January dividend. Next month, it is understood, upwards of five millions will be paid as compensation to the telegraph shareholders, and the prices of investments are expected to experience some rise in consequence.

LONDON, JANUARY, 1, 1870.

TO-DAY THE NEW SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY LAW comes into force, and we shall shortly see in practice how it works. It would be useless, therefore, to speculate further at present upon a matter which we shall soon be able to test in the best of all ways, by experience. But how it is expected to work by at least one class interested, namely, candidates for the honours of bankruptcy, is plain enough. The dread of the new law has had a remarkable effect upon them, as will appear from a comparison of the number of bankruptcies gazetted during the last month with the number gazetted during the corresponding period of 1868. We give them in a tabular form:—

Cases from Manchester and Leeds in which from pressure of business it is not stated whether the bankrupt is to surrender in London or the country 31

It thus appears that the bankruptcies gazetted during the last month have been very nearly twice as many as in the corresponding period of 1868. And were we able to give the result of last night's Gazette, the last of the old year and of the old bankruptcy law, the contrast would probably be even stronger.

Which of the changes, then, to be made by the new law has excited such a panic among the insolvent classes, and driven them in crowds into the bankruptcy court? There can be little doubt about this, we think. From to-day no one can be made bankrupt upon his own petition, but only upon that of a creditor. It has been very generally feared, and we have always shared in the fear, that this change would be greater in name than in reality, that friendly creditors would be easily found, and collusive petitions easily procured. But the figures we have given are very encouraging. They show that the people best qualified to judge have, at least, some misgivings on the subject.

WE PUBLISH IN ANOTHER COLUMN a letter from Mr. Dawson, the attorney for the prosecution in the case of the Overend & Gurney directors, in which he complains of the comments in our last number upon a letter of his to the Times. Together with his letter Mr. Dawson has sent us a statement which he requests us candidly to peruse. We have candidly perused it, and we are totally at a loss to see what it has to do with the subject of our remarks. Our remarks were, in substance, to the effect that a letter of his to the Times, in which he pointed out that in the Times' report of the trial the name of Mr. Yelverton, one of the prosecuting counsel, had been omitted, and went on to say that Mr. Yelverton had most assiduously attended to his instructions throughout, but omitted to mention that Mr. Yelverton was his son, was an improper letter. Mr. Dawson's statement contains a narrative of his connection with the case, of the relations between him and his client on the one hand and his counsel on the other, and the wrongs which he considers he has sustained from all parties. But he omits to show the connection between all this and the propriety or impropriety of his letter to the Times. All we can say as to this statement is that if Mr. Dawson has any ground of complaint against either his client or his counsel, there are tribunals before which he can make his complaint heard. And if he establishes his case before those tribunals he shall have our most cordial support, for, as he rightly says in his letter, the honour and privileges of the profession demand our impartial and jealous guardianship.

As to Mr. Dawson's letter, which we publish, the greater part of it seems to us to have no very definite bearing upon the subject of the remarks of which he complains. But there are two tangible points in it. First, he objects to our applying the word "puff" to his letter to the Times. But if a letter to the Times by a father, a solicitor, praising the way in which his son, a barrister, has done his work, be not properly called a puff, we do not know what is. Secondly, he says that "the principal worker (we suppose he means either himself or his son) having been made a cat's-paw of has reaped neither praise nor profit." That may be so; but two wrongs do not make a right. And Mr. Dawson's letter to the Times was none the less a very improper one.

THE CORONER'S INQUEST upon the body of the Welsh fasting girl, as she has been popularly styled, has ended in the committal of her father upon a charge of manslaughter. It is said the Treasury have taken the matter into their own hands, and as the case is pending we shall abstain from discussing its merits. But there can be no harm in indicating the kind of legal questions which must arise in such a case, and they are of rather a curious kind, bearing somewhat upon that most perplexed subject, the legal doctrines of causation.

The parents of the girl, and apparently the girl herself, had long publicly maintained that she lived without food. This representation was naturally received with some incredulity, and at last a sort of vigilance committee was formed to watch the case, with a staff of doctors and nurses acting in concert with them. The vigilance party, with the full consent of the girl's father, took her entirely in charge, and kept a rigid watch and ward over her. They were most willing that she should have any amount of food, provided she or her father asked for it, but she should have none on the sly. The father, and it would seem the girl herself as long as she was in a condition to exercise a choice, were determined not to ask for food; though they were quite anxious that food should be had, but only on the sly; and between the two parties the girl died.

It is somewhat as if she had been lying in a room with two doors, a front door and a back. A. locks the back door, but would admit any amount of food by the front. B.

bars the front door, but tries his best to smuggle food in by the back. Between them the patient dies. Who killed her, A. who locked the back door, or B. who barred the front? If that were all, it would be difficult to say, that either did so singly. And, therefore, so far, the jury were probably right in acquitting the doctors, nurses, and the rest of any criminal liability. But in the actual case B., who represents the father, not only barred the front door, but was also a consenting party to the locking of the back, trusting, it would seem, to his own ingenuity to evade the vigilance of his rivals and open the door on the sly. And upon this ground the jury may have been right in their finding against the father.

There is another possible view of the case however. It may be said that both parties combined to carry on a contest of wits, a sort of game of chess, over the girl, which was from the first manifestly likely to result in her death, and which, in fact, it did do. If it be maintainable that those concerned were upon this ground guilty of manslaughter, which we by no means say is the case, then it seems to follow that both parties to the contest are in the same position, and both or neither ought to be indicted.

THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE PUBLISHED a few days ago upon the Alabama question throws no very new light upon the questions of international law at issue between England and America. The most remarkable point about the correspondence is the contrast in tone, style, and manner of treatment between the two principal documents of the series, Mr. Fish's despatch to Mr. Motley and Lord Clarendon's memorandum in reply. One point in which that contrast is very marked is the mode in which each treats the lawyers, and the legal tribunals of the country of the other. Lord Clarendon in his memorandum supports his position upon every question of law on which he touches by constant reference to the authority of the most eminent living judges and jurists of America. Mr. Fish refers to English lawyers and law courts, we believe, but once, in the following graceful passage. After enumerating sundry alleged wrongs, some of which are matters that every student knows not to be offences against international law at all, though as to others there may be more doubt, he proceeds:—

"Ample proofs of the wrong committed were submitted to the Queen's Government. Indeed, these wrongs were open, notorious, perpetrated in the face of day, the subject of debate and of boast even in the House of Commons.

The Queen's Ministers excused themselves by alleged defects in the municipal law of the country. Learned counsel either advised that the wrongs committed did not constitute violations of the municipal law, or else gave sanction to artful devices of deceit to cover up such violations of law. And, strange to say, the courts of England or of Scotland up to the very highest were occupied month after month with judicial niceties and technicalities of statute construction in this respect, while the Queen's Government itself, including the omnipotent Parliament, which might have settled these questions in an hour by appropriate legislation, sat with folded arms as if unmindful of its international obligations, and suffered ship after ship to be constructed in its ports to wage war on the United States."

Can it be that Mr. Fish has formed his idea of the judicial bench in England from what he has lately seen or read of the bench in New York, and his idea of the English bar from that section of the New York bar (we hope and believe a very small section) which has furnished of late some distinguished ornaments to the bench? Or is this after all but an example of the old maxim. "No case: abuse the plaintiff's attorney."

IT IS STATED by the Times that, in consequence of over-fatigue during the late winter circuit, Mr. Justice Lush has been ordered by his medical advisers to abstain from work for a short time. The regret which such an announcement would at any time have occasioned will be very much increased by the fact that the Queen's Bench is overburdened with business, and toiling in vain to overtake vast arrears, while at the same time the judicial staff of the court has, since the death of Mr. Justice Hayes, been quite short-handed.

ANNUITIES UNDER WILLS.

A devise of the rents and profits of land is a devise of the land (Doe d. Goldin v. Lakeman, 2 B. & Ad. 30), and, consequently, in wills made before the Wills Act, such a devise confers a life estate in the land, and in wills made since, the fee simple. Of course, however, in either case a different intention of the testator appearing by the context will have effect given to it. And as to personal estate, "prima facie a gift of the produce of a fund is a gift of that fund in perpetuity, and is consequently a gift of the fund itself, unless there is something upon the face of the will to show that such was not the intention" (Adamson v. Armitage, 19 Ves. 418). These are first principles. Where the gift is of an annuity, there is a prima facie rule which may be controlled by the evidence supplied by the context, but there is more scope for doubt as to the duration of the gift.

The rule is, that when the will creates an annuity, a gift of that annuity simpliciter (i.e., a gift without specifying duration) is only a gift for the life of the donee. "There is a difference between an annuity existing at the time of the will and one created by it de novo." If one gives by will an annuity not existing before to A., A. shall have it only for life" (Lord Hardwicke in Savory v. Dyer, Amb. 140, approved by Lord Cottenham in Blewitt v. Roberts, Cr. & Ph. 280). In Nichols v. Hawkes (1 W. R. 124, 10 Ha. 343), it was argued that as to annuities payable out of the rents and profits of real estate, the 28th section of the Wills Act, enacting that a devise without words of limitation shall pass the fee, rendered it incumbent on the Court to construe such annuities as perpetual, unless the testator had clearly expressed the contrary. But the Vice-Chancellor held that the section does not apply to an annuity or rent-charge created de novo by the testator, and that the rule laid down by Lord Hardwicke remained unaltered.

To the above rule there is an exception where the gift is in effect a gift of the produce of a fund. The gift is there brought within the general rule applying to a gift of the income of personality. In Lett v. Randall (9 W. R. 130, 2 De. G. F. & J. 388), Lord Westbury described this exception thus: "To make an annuity created by will perpetual, there must be express words in the will so describing it, or the testator must by some language in the will indicate an intention to that effect. The most common indication is a direction by the testator to segregate and appropriate a portion of his property, from the interest or profits of which the annuity is to be paid. Where this is done, the annuity when mentioned in the will represents the corpus so appropriated, and, the corpus passing by the bequest of the annuity, the annuity may be said to be perpetual."

Thus in Hawlings v. Jennings (13 Ves. 39), a gift of "£200 a-year, being part of the money I have in Bank security," was held a gift of a perpetual annuity. The principle here is, that where the testator has appropriated a particular property to the annuity, this is tantamount to giving the annuitant the produce of that property, and so to giving him the property itself. In Kerr v. The Mid-

* As to a gift of an annuity created by some previous instrument, in most cases the terms in which the annuity was described in the gift would probably determine whether the testator meant the donee to take the whole or only a life interest: as a general principle, however, it seems reasonable to presume that the testator meant his donee to take the annuity for its utmost duration. To this effect is Gifford v. Goldsey (2 Vern. 35) [determined on the authority of a case in Roll. Abr. I. 831] where A. having devised to B. £20 a-year out of the rent of a lease determinable on lives, and B. dying during the term, the annuity was held to continue to his executors.

dissem Hospital (1 W. R. 93, 2 De G. M. & G. 583), Lord St. Leonard's, L.C., said, "It is perfectly settled that if an annuity be given simpliciter, that is, to one generally, a life interest only passes. It is equally, I believe, undisputed that if an annuity be directed to be provided out of the proceeds of property, or out of property generally, if an annuity is to be brought into existence by the application of property, and that annuity is given to a party generally, he will take the property appropriated to purchase the annuity and therefore the annuity is purchased." In such a case the annuitant may elect to take either the annuity when purchased, or the purchase-money in gross (Kerr v. The Middlesex Hospital, ubi. sup.). In Hill v. Potts (10 W. R. 439), the testator gave to A. all his property "both landed and personal except £500 a-year which I give to B." upon which Vice-Chancellor Wood said, "I cannot read this first gift as meaning anything else than 'except £500 a-year produced by my property,' and, consequently, held that the annuity to B. was a perpetual one. As to these cases in which the annuity is, as it were, carved out of or excepted from an absolute gift of an entire fund, it is, of course, possible that other portions of the same will may show that the exception was not intended to be for the purpose of an absolute gift. See Evans v. Jones (2 Coll. 516), as explained by Vice-Chancellor Wood in Hill v. Potts (ubi. sup.). So in Wilson v. Maddison (2 Y. & C. C. 372), a direction to pay an annuity "from the interest of my property in the Bank of England" for the maintenance of certain persons, was held to be not a gift of part of the stock, but only of life annuities charged on the stock. And in Innes v. Mitchell (9 Ves. 212), a gift of £200 a-year to a woman for the use of herself and her children, with a direction to the executors to invest £5,000 "in lieu thereof" "for her and their use, and to the longest liver of her and her children, subject to an equal division of the interest while more than one of them are alive" was held to create only an annuity terminable at the death of the survivor. And in Wilson v. Maddison (2 Y. & C. C. 372), a direction to pay £30 a-year "from the interest of my funded money in the Bank of England" "for the maintenance" of a woman and her children, created an annuity only for the life of the parties and the longest liver of them. In Ross v. Borer (2 J. & H. 469), it was held by Vice-Chancellor Wood that a bare direction "to purchase an annuity in Government securities to the amount of £50 a-year for M.S." conferred a perpetual annuity to be provided by an investment in so much Government securities as would bring in £50 a-year.

In the often-cited case of Stokes v. Heron (12 Cl. & F. 161), as interpreted by Lord Westbury in Lett v. Randall (ubi. sup.) the decision proceeded on the ground of an appropriation of a requisite portion of personality to form a fund for the payment of perpetual annuities. In Lett v. Randall, the direction was from all the testator's realty and personality to make up to his wife £1,200 a-year, including what she might be entitled to under her late father's will. Lord Westbury said that under these circumstances it was not possible for the trustees to segregate any specific portion to answer this gift; and he, therefore, held the annuity to be one for life only. The general principle laid down by Lord Westbury in this case is indisputable, but his application to the particular circumstances of that case must be received with great caution. In the case of Stokes v. Heron the direction was to pay annuities of £100 each to several people, but in one case the annuity was to be only £100 a-year made up including "any property" the annuitant "might possess"; here all the annuities were held to be perpetual, and in that respect Stokes v. Heron and Lett v. Randall are inconsistent.

An annuity will not be considered as perpetual merely because it may be charged upon the fee-simple of real estate (Mansergh v. Campbell, 7 W. R. 72, 2 De G. & J. 232). In Hedges v. Harpur (2 De G. & J. 129) a testator bequeathed £500 a year to each of his daughters, and after the death of each daughter he gave her share to her children, and directed that if any daughter should die without issue, that annuity should sink into the residue. Lords Justice Knight Bruce and Turner held, overruling Lord Langdale, that this implied an intention that each daughter's annuity was not to cease unless she died without issue.

But the rule that gift of an annuity simpliciter does not prima facie confer a perpetual annuity applies equally to the case where the annuity is given to A., and after his decease to B. Thus a simple bequest of £100 a year to A. for life, and after his death to B., gives an annuity terminating on the death of the longest liver of A. and B. (Yates v. Maddan, 3 McN. & G. 532; Blennitt v. Roberts [ubi. sup.]). The context, however, may show that a perpetual annuity was meant. (See Potter v. Baker, 13 Beav. 373, Parson v. Parson, 19 Beav. 146.) In the latter case the bequest was of £60 a year out of the testator's Bank stock to F. P., with a direction that "this" should not be sold till after the death of the annuitant and his wife and the majority of his youngest child. The Master of the Rolls held that this latter direction was inconsistent with anything except an absolute annuity.

It remains to notice the devolution of a perpetual annuity. A perpetual rent-charge or rent reserved, be it remembered, is real estate, and as such descends to the heir. But a rent cannot be reserved upon a rent, so as to be real estate; i.e., if A. gives to B. a perpetual rent-charge on land, and B. carves out of it a portion which he gives to C., C.'s interest will be personalty. Earl Stafford v. Buckley (2 Ves. Sen., 177); and see Aubin v. Daly (4 B. & Ald. 67). But a mere annuity "is a thing very distinct from a rent-charge, with which it is very frequently confounded; a rent charge being a burden imposed upon and issuing out of lands; whereas an annuity is a yearly sum, chargeable only upon the person of the grantor" (Blackstone). Yet a mere annuity, which is personal property, may be bequeathed so as to be descendible to the heirs; though it cannot be entailed (Earl Stafford v. Buckley, ubi. sup.; Turner v. Turner, Amb. 776). "There is no doubt, said Vice-Chancellor Shadwell in Taylor v. Martindale (12 Sim. 160), that an annuity, though personal in its nature, may be granted to a man and his heirs." There are numerous cases in which personalty has been bequeathed to one and his heirs, and the Court has decided that the heir-at-law should take. Many such cases are cited in De Beauvoir v. De Beauvoir, 3 H. L. 554. In that case the testator bequeathed property in the funds upon ultimate trusts for his own "right heirs for ever"; it was argued that the testator must have meant those who would take personal property—i.e., his next of kin, but the House of Lords thought otherwise. In Taylor v. Martindale (ubi. sup.) the gift was to A. B. "£50 a-year for ever." The Vice-Chancellor after stating that "an annuity, when granted with words of inheritance, is descendible, but as to its security, is personal only," continued—"In this case, however, the testator has not used the words of inheritance; and it is not imperative on me to construe the words 'for ever,' when used with reference to an annuity to signify 'heirs.' In my opinion the question is, which construction is most beneficial to the annuitant; and it seems to me to be most beneficial to him that the gift should be construed as a gift to him and his executors." We have cited at length these words of Vice-Chancellor Shadwell on account of a recent decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins. In Parsons v. Parsons (17 W. R. 1005), the direction was to pay certain annuities to the testator's children, "or their heirs respectively." The Vice-Chancellor said that Taylor v. Martindale enabled him to give the annuities to the children's next of kin, in accordance with what he believed to be the testator's meaning. The substituted gift to the "heirs" was, he said, a gift to those who could take under the name of "heirs"—i.e., the next of kin. It is very possible that this testator's intentions were better effectuated by this decision than by giving the annuities to the "heirs," but the decision nevertheless should not be relied on as a precedent. The case of Taylor v. Martindale itself rules that a bequest to "heirs" gives the personality to the heirs. The context may show that the testator meant "next of kin," but the Court cannot presume that, unless the context does supply some evidence. And prima facie "heirs" must undoubtedly be taken to mean heirs. All that Taylor v. Martindale decides is that "for ever" need not necessarily mean "heirs" and that if there is doubt the Court will take the most convenient construction. Vice-Chancellor Shadwell's very words show that if the phrase before him had been "heirs" his decision would have been reverse of Vice-Chancellor Malins' on the same phrase.

This must not be confused with the case of a bequest to trustees, in which case a gift on trusts to trustees and their heirs, will, at any rate, in the absence of a very strong expression to the contrary, be held to vest the trust property in the trustees and their personal representatives (De Beauvoir v. De Beauvoir, ubi sup. at pp. 545-6).

THE SEPARATE TRADING OF MARRIED WOMEN.

There are seven circumstances under which a married woman may carry on a trade or business. First, she may do so as the agent of her husband. This is the most common form under which a married woman trades. The business, although carried on by her, and even in her own name, is in law the business of her husband. He takes, or is entitled to take, all profits, and is liable upon all contracts. Secondly, where the husband being civilly dead, the wife carries on business as a single woman. Thirdly, a married woman can carry on trade in her individual capacity within the City of London. Fourthly, a married woman may absent herself from her husband and carry on business without his permission or without his knowledge. In this case he is entitled to her earnings and to her stock in trade; but so long as he does not intermeddle with the business, he is not liable upon her contracts. Fifthly, a married woman deserted by her husband may obtain a protection order under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 21, and carry on a trade. She is then, in respect of that trade, exactly in the position of a single woman. Sixthly, she may carry on a trade in pursuance of an ante-nuptial agreement with her husband. Seventhly, she may carry on trade in pursuance of a post-nuptial agreement with her husband. It is the last three forms which we propose to discuss in the following remarks.

If a husband, before marriage, contracts with his intended wife or her trustees that she shall be allowed to carry on any business or trade on her own account, this contract will be good against him and his creditors. The profits of the business as well as anything purchased thereout, and also the stock in trade, will be the wife's separate property in equity, although at law they are of course the property of the husband, and the only difficulty that can arise is from the reputed ownership clauses in the Bankruptcy Acts in the event of the bankruptcy of the husband, if he is living in the house where the business is being carried on. The leading authority is the old case of Jarman v. Woollaton (6 Durnf. & E. 618). There by an ante-nuptial settlement the wife's stock in trade, book debts, and effects were assigned to a trustee for her separate use, "to the intent that she might carry on her trade at her own risk and charges, and for her own separate use and benefit." The wife, subsequent to the marriage, carried on the business in a house of which her husband paid the rent, and was at the expense of fitting up. The husband became bankrupt, and his assignees took possession of the stock in trade and furniture. The trustee brought an action to recover it. The jury found that the business was not carried on by the wife separately, and gave a verdict for the defendants for the stock, and for the plaintiff for the furniture. The defendants moved for a new trial but the rule was discharged, and Mr. Justice Buller said, "I think the verdict bears rather hard upon the wife respecting the stock in trade. For the weight of the evidence is, I think, against the defendants upon that point, and there is no pretence to say that there was fraud in any part of the case." The inference then fairly is, that had the jury found that the wife was carrying on separate trade, the verdict would have been against the assignees in respect of the stock in trade as well as in respect of the furniture. This view is supported by the case of Haselinton v. Gill, cited in the case of Jarman v. Woollaton. If a husband, after marriage, agrees to permit his wife to carry on a separate trade, equity will give effect to the agreement, which will be good against him, but may be void against his creditors as a post-nuptial settlement.

Whenever a wife carries on a separate trade by the permission of her husband two questions arise—first, in whose name—her own or her husband's—ought she to contract; and second, what are the remedies of those with whom she contracts, in the event of a breach of contract. The only circumstance under which the first question is practically important is with reference to bills and notes.^{*} There is no doubt that when a married woman is carrying on a separate trade by the permission of her husband he is liable for her trade debts, although some eminent authorities have expressed an opinion that equity would confine the creditors to the assets of the trade. But, if property is vested in a trustee upon trust to permit a married woman to carry on business, Mr. Bright says, "it is presumed that the husband is absolved from all liability for debts contracted in it . . . for in such a case the wife is the agent, not of the husband, but of the trustee; the debts, therefore, are those of the trustee, and, since he is legally entitled to the profits, he is legally responsible for the debts of his agent (the wife) incurred in conducting it." But, assuming it to be a case in which the husband is liable, ought the wife to draw, accept, and endorse bills in her own name or in that of her husband? In Barlow v. Bishop (1 East, 432) a married woman carrying on a separate trade endorsed a note received by her to the plaintiff in her own name. It was held that the endorsement did not pass any interest to the indorsee. Lord Kenyon, however, said that, "as he permitted her to carry on trade on her own account, and this was a transaction in the course of that trade, if she had endorsed the note in the name of her husband, I am not prepared to say that that would not have availed; as many acts of this nature may be done by a power of attorney; and the jury might have presumed what was necessary in favour of any authority from her husband for this purpose." But in Cotes v. Davis (1 Campbell, 485) Lord E. enbrough said that "the husband may authorise the wife to indorse bills of exchange on promissory notes as his agent," and, on its being objected that the indorsement ought to have been in the husband's name, said that in that case it was fair to presume "that the husband authorised her to endorse notes in the name by which she herself passed in the world." From these two cases it may be gathered that the wife ought to use the name of her husband, but that, under certain circumstances, if she uses her own, it will be equally effectual. On the second point it is clear that, where a married woman is carrying on separate trade, anyone with whom she contracts has, irrespective of any claim upon her husband, a right in equity to go against the stock-in-trade and other separate property of that married woman.

If a married woman who has been deserted by her husband obtains a protection order, and carries on a business, as regard that business she is a feme sole. All the profits are hers at law as well as in equity, and she can sue, and be sued upon contracts entered into by her in reference to such trade. But supposing a married woman carrying on a trade, where her husband had deserted her, believing him to be dead, does not obtain a protection order, or supposing she is compelled to leave him on account of his violence and does not obtain a judicial separation are the profits of her business her separate estate, or can her husband appropriate them and claim everything purchased therewith? It is somewhat singular that all the treatises on the law of husband and wife cite on this point but two cases Cecil v. Juxon (1 Atkyns, 278), and Lamphir v. Creed (8 Ves. 599). The first of these cases was as follows:—Emanuel Juxon left his wife Mary and two children and went abroad and did not see or send to them for fourteen years. Mary Juxon's mother thereupon lent her certain goods to carry on the business of a milliner with, and subsequently gave her certain other goods. Mary Juxon saved £20 and lent it to certain borrowers, who executed a bond for the loan, but made the bond payable to Emanuel Juxon. Emanuel Juxon shortly afterwards made forcible entry into Mary Juxon's house, and carried off certain goods. Thereupon the suit was instituted to obtain the amount of the bond and re-delivery of the goods. Sir Joseph Jekyll was of opinion that "as the desertion of the defendant Emanuel Juxon was fully proved, this Court would look upon any thing acquired by the wife in his absence to subsist herself and family as her separate property and not liable to the disposition of the husband when he should please to come home and plunder her; and, therefore, declared that the plaintiff, Mary Juxon, is entitled to the goods that were in her possession, and also to the stock in her separate trade before the same were taken away by the defendant Emanuel Juxon for his separate use, and that she is also entitled to the bond and note."

In Lamphir v. Creed the married woman who was carrying on trade without the interference of her husband, who resided in a different part of the kingdom, purchased a lottery ticket and agreed with A. that half the purchase-money should be treated as a loan to him, and that they should be jointly concerned in the adventure. It was held that the purchase-money belonged to the husband; and that, therefore, the produce was his also.

The difference between the two cases consists in this—that in Cecil v. Juxon the wife was trading with property given to her by her relatives for that purpose, and the husband had deserted the wife, whereas in Lamphir v. Creed there was nothing to show that the separation was not purely voluntary, and the wife was not set up in trade independently of her husband. Whether the Court of Equity would now hold that a wife who, being compelled to leave her husband on account of his cruelty, sets up in business for herself, is or is not entitled to her earnings as her separate estate, has yet to be decided.

RECENT DECISIONS.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

LANDS CLAUSES AND RAILWAYS CLAUSES ACTS, 1845
—LAND INJURIOUSLY AFFECTED—VIBRATION AND NOISE—LAND NOT TAKEN BY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Hammersmith, &c., Railway Company v. Brand,
H.L., 18 W. R. 12.

The name and facts of this case are probably already familiar to most of our readers. It attracted a good deal of attention when first decided in the Court of Queen's Bench, and again when it was before the Exchequer Chamber. It is now, however, finally determined, and we noticed the decision as soon as it was given (13 S. J. 763). We, besides, noticed it more than once before that time, and during its progress towards the House of Lords.

We will now only state briefly the point decided and the arguments on which the opinions of the judges and the decision of the House of Lords were based.

The material facts were, shortly, that the plaintiff's house was injured by the vibration, noise, and smoke of the defendant's railway. A jury summoned under the Lands Clauses Act estimated the injury inflicted by the vibration at £272. None of the plaintiff's land had been taken by the defendants, nor was there any structural injury caused or apprehended to his house, which had not been injuriously affected by the operations of the defendants during the construction of their works. If the actual construction of the works for the railway had caused injury to the plaintiff's house, the plaintiff would have been entitled to compensation.

The point for decision depended upon the construction of the Railways and Lands Clauses Acts, 1845, and is shortly stated by Lush, J., to be, "did the Legislature intend to compensate for damage occasioned by the 'making and using' the railway, or for damage occasioned by the 'making' only apart from its use." It was admitted in all the judgments that the words of the statute, giving compensation to landowners, "taken in their literal and primary sense, would be read as denoting the mere work of construction, and if they occurred in a contract between the company and a person who thereby undertook to make the line, this would be their undoubted meaning." The contention, of course, was that the scope and object of the statute showed that the words in question were not to be taken in their primary and literal sense, but in a more extended meaning.

Willes, Keating, and Lush, J.J., and Pigott, B., assented to this contention for the plaintiff and gave their opinion in favour of his right to recover compensation for the damage done to his house. Blackburn, J., thought the plaintiff was not entitled to this compensation because "the onus lies on the plaintiff to show that the Legislature has given compensation, and I cannot find in the statute any language which to my mind expresses an intention to give compensation for such an injury." The opinion of Bramwell, B., is somewhat different from those of the other judges. He thought that if the plaintiff had no right of action against the company for this vibration, &c., he was entitled to compensation under the statute. If, however, he could maintain such an action Bramwell, B., thought that the plaintiff was not entitled to such compensation, and that he should be left to his remedy by action alone. The question whether the plaintiff was entitled to maintain such an action depended upon the authority of R. v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30) and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company (8 W. R. 549), which have decided that a railway company is not liable for damage caused by the working of the line, unless they have been guilty of negligence. They are not liable for the necessary consequences of working the railway. Bramwell, B., thinks that these cases should be overruled by the House of Lords, that it should be held that the plaintiff in this case could maintain an action, and that he was not entitled to compensation under the statute.

Lords Chelmsford and Colonsay, Lord Cairns dissenting, held that the plaintiff was not entitled to the compensation claimed, and reversed the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber. They also expressed their approval of the principle on which R. v. Pease and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company was decided. This decision, therefore, follows the sound principle that the plain and ordinary meaning of the words of a statute is to be followed, and not the presumed intention of the Legislature, except so far as that intention can be gathered from the words themselves.

The decision also in effect affirms the cases of R. v. Pease, and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company, and the rule is, therefore, now finally settled as far as it can be settled by judicial decision, that a landowner whose property is injured by the ordinary and proper working of a railway can neither recover compensation under the Lands and Railways Clauses Acts, 1845, nor by action. This decision of the House of Lords, doubtless, inflicts a great hardship on the plaintiff, and many others in his position; but it is better that a remedy should be provided for such cases by legislation than that a statute should receive a construction contrary to the plain meaning of the words in which it is expressed.

EQUITY.

BEQUESTS TO ERECT CHAPELS, INVOLVING THE ACQUISITION OF LAND.

Re Watnough's Trusts, V.C.M., 17 W. R. 959.

An apparent difference of opinion between two branches of the courts as to the establishment of bequests of this character, induces us to call attention to this case. Where money is bequeathed to erect a building for any of the purposes that fall within the description of charitable, the old rule was that the party seeking to establish the bequest and take the case out of the Statute of Mortmain, had upon him the burden of showing that the testator intended the bequest not to be laid out in the purchase of land (Attorney-General v. Nash, 3 Bro. C. C. 588). Lord Brougham, indeed, once declared that a positive intention to exclude the purchase of land must be found in the will (Giblett v. Hobson, 3 M. & K. 517). All the early cases show that a direction to build implies a direction to acquire land for the purpose of building, unless an intention to exclude the purchase of land be found in the will itself, extrinsic evidence being inadmissible. In other words, unless the testator points, by the terms of his will, to some land already in mortmain, a direction to acquire land for the purpose of building will be implied (Attorney-General v. Davies, 9 Ves. 535).

In Re Watnough's Trusts, the Vice-Chancellor followed the current of the earlier authorities. There is, unquestionably, a tendency at the present day towards suffering encroachments on the provision of the Statute of Mortmain, and the recent decision of the Master of the Rolls, in Booth v. Carter (L. R. 3 Eq. 757), almost seems to have been pronounced in deference to this tendency. In Booth v. Carter, the bequest was to the trustees of a particular chapel in C., to be applied towards the erection of a new chapel in C. The Master of the Rolls affirmed the validity of the bequest in a very short judgment, on the ground that there was land vested in the trustees at the date of the will upon which a new chapel could be built, though the evidence of this, resting as it must have done on extrinsic evidence, ought hardly to have weighed with his Lordship in deciding the case. So too, in Senell v. Crene-Read (L. R. 3 Eq. 60), the same learned judge upheld a naked bequest of money to be applied in building a parsonage house, where there was glebe land belonging to the living at the date of the will. We have always thought the decision in Dent v. Allcroft (30 Beav. 335), rested on a narrow basis, where the bequest to build almshouses was held to exclude the Statute of Mortmain by reason of a direction that the application of the bequest was to be consistent with the laws then in force, there being no reference whatever to land already in mortmain as a site for the almshouses. We cannot think that the foregoing decisions are sufficient to shake the general principle established by a series of decisions, that a bequest to erect a building prima facie implies a direction to acquire land for the purpose, and that the burden is upon the person claiming the bequest of showing from the will itself that the testator did not mean that land should be acquired, but referred to land already in mortmain.

RAILWAY COMPANIES AND THEIR CREDITORS.

Griffiths v. Cambrian Railway Company, M.R., 17 W. R. 979.

The exceptional protection which the Legislature has of late seen fit to extend to railway companies when unable to meet their engagements with their creditors, was extended to them not for the benefit of the companies, nor of their creditors, but of the general public. The same motives of public good which induce the Legislature to confer compulsory powers of taking land on a railway company, induce it when that company falls into difficulties to stay proceedings against it, to the injury, perhaps, of the private creditor, but to the gain of the public, who are interested in having the railway kept open for their use. Hence, the provisions of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, which empowers the Court, after the filing of a scheme, to restrain any action against the company on such terms as the Court thinks fit, and stays execution or other process against the property of the company, after notice published of the filing of the scheme. The effect of these sections is to restrain proceedings by outside creditors, or unpaid landowners during the maturing of the scheme (Re Cambrian Railway Company's Scheme, 16 W. R. 346), and renders it essential that they should obtain leave before issuing execution. Re Devon and Somerset Railway Company (17 W. R. 133), though protection against a vendor's suit for specific performance cannot be obtained during that period, except on terms of submitting to a decree (Robertson v. Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Company, 17 W. R. 138). But a scheme is not binding on outside creditors or unpaid landowners who have not, or a majority of whose class have not, assented to it; and it is essential that the scheme should make reasonable provisions for the claims of creditors and landowners. In fact, wherever a scheme contains a clause seriously affecting outside creditors, the Court will require the consent of every such outside creditor before it confirms the scheme (Re Bristol and North Somerset Railway Company, 16 W. R. 1112, L. R. 6 Eq. 448). As regards debenture creditors, on the other hand, the scheme, when assented to in writing by three-fourths in value of them, is binding on them all unless fraud be shown (Re East and West Junction Railway Company, L. R. 8 Eq. 87).

Section 36, the corresponding section of the Cambrian Railways Act, 1868, stays proceedings in respect of antecedent liabilities until the 31st of July, 1873, unless with the leave of the Court of Chancery, and on such terms as the Court may impose. It may be worth while to speculate in what cases the Court would give leave. Clearly the Act is one which ought to be interpreted favourably to the creditor. In Griffiths v. Cambrian Railway Company, the motion was by an unpaid landowner who had obtained the usual decree for specific performance, for liberty to prosecute the suit by a sale of the land. So far as regards stopping a race between creditors, the operation of the section is salutary. But where a creditor has obtained a decree, ought he not to be allowed by the Court to reap the fruits of it?

This was Lord Hatherley's view when Vice-Chancellor, in Re London Cotton Company (14 W. R. 275), where a creditor who had sued out a writ of execution and placed it in the sheriff's hands before the winding-up, obtained leave after the winding-up had commenced to put in force the execution, notwithstanding section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862. In the case before us Lord Romilly seems to have been of the same opinion, as leave to go on with the suit was given. And we venture to submit that, under such circumstances, the plaintiff ought to find no obstacle in the way of a sale of the land.

JUDGMENT-CREDITORS AND THE ACT TO AMEND THE LAW RELATING TO FUTURE JUDGMENTS, &c. (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112.)

Ex parte Padwick, M.R., 18 W. R. 8.

The judgment-creditor's right to obtain an order for sale of his debtor's land (in the extended sense in which the word "land" is used in the Act), by petition in a summary way, extends only to such land as shall have been actually delivered in execution. There are many interests in land among those enumerated in 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13 which are incapable of actual delivery, and to which, therefore, the recent Act does not apply. An equitable interest in leasehold estate is one of these interests. The petitioner, therefore, was without a remedy, inasmuch as the year had not expired since the entering up of the judgment so as to entitle him to a decree for sale under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13; nor, as we have already seen, had he a right to petition the Court.

under the recent Act. The Master of the Rolls' observations on the case indicate sufficiently the chaotic state to which the law of judgments has been reduced. What actual delivery may be, as distinguished from delivery pur et simple, it is impossible even to surmise; but this at all events is clear, that the benefit of the summary remedy reaches only to interests in land such as are capable of delivery in execution, thus restricting very considerably the meaning of "lands" as defined in section 2 of the Act.

It will be remembered that in Re Cornbridge Railway Company (16 W. R. 506, L. R. 5 Eq. 413) it was decided that a judgment-creditor who has sued out a writ of elegit is not entitled to an order for sale upon petition where the lands have been already extended and delivered under a prior elegit. In this case, as in Ex parte Padwick, actual possession was treated as being a condition precedent to relief under the recent Act being obtained.

Where actual possession cannot be obtained the creditor must still assert his equitable right by bill. See as to this Mitford on Pleading (p. 101), Smith v. Hurst (10 Ha. 48.) The creditor in Re Cornbridge Railway Company after suing out his elegit should have filed a bill to redeem, and having thus got rid of the prior elegit, and acquired actual possession of the land, he might proceed by way of petition under the recent Act.

The Act, therefore, does not enlarge the rights of judgment-creditors. All that it does is to assimilate the law affecting freeholds, copyholds, and leaseholds to that affecting purely personal estate, by requiring actual execution before a petition for sale will lie. Where actual execution is impossible, the creditor is left to the remedies which existed before the Act.

The Master of the Rolls doubted whether on a strict construction of the words actually delivered in execution the 13th section of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, had not been repealed. But in Re Cornbridge Railway Company, Vice-Chancellor Wood said that it could not have been intended that all the remedies given by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, should be swept away by a side wind.

REVIEWS.

Cases and Opinions on Constitutional Law and various points of English Jurisprudence, Collected and Digested from Official and other Sources; with Notes. By WILLIAM FORSYTH, M.A., Q.C. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1869.

It has often been remarked that, whereas in America the official opinions given by successive Attorneys-General have been carefully collected and regularly published, in England the contrary rule has prevailed, and the opinions of the law officers have in general been even studiously concealed, and buried among the unsearched records of the various departments of the Government. Our readers will recollect that not very long ago a strong objection was made by the Government in office to the production of an opinion given by the law officers of the Crown several years previously, but upon which they had been again called upon to act. The rule that such opinions should not, except under special circumstances, be published at the time they are delivered is probably a wise one. The contrary practice would, we think, certainly tend to diminish the responsibility of the Ministry in office. And, of course, while questions of delicacy are still pending, as, for instance, the Alabama question, much embarrassment might result from publishing the opinions of the law officers upon the various phases of the controversy. But when a certain time has elapsed no harm, but, on the contrary, much good, may be done by the publication of the deliberate opinions of great lawyers upon great questions. Except, however, in the case of Chalmers' "Opinions of Eminent Lawyers," nothing of the kind has ever been attempted in any systematic way in England. Mr. Forsyth has, therefore, met a real want in the present work, and has met it, on the whole, well.

In estimating the merits of such a work as the present, the first point which we should like to be able to determine is the degree of judgment shown by the author in the selection of his materials. As, however, we have, of course, no means of knowing what materials Mr. Forsyth had at his disposal, we can scarcely form an opinion upon the point; but of the materials which Mr. Forsyth has actually embodied in his book, no one can fail to see that they are of extremely unequal value. Some of the opinions here published are upon subjects of great importance, and tend to throw much light upon those subjects. Of others it may well be doubted whether they were worth publishing at all. The first chapter, for instance, contains opinions of eminent lawyers upon the subject of the "common and statute law applicable to the colonies," and nearly all the opinions in this chapter are instructive as illustrating general principles. The second chapter contains thirteen opinions on the "ecclesiastical law applicable to the colonies." And while some of these opinions are undoubtedly instructive, probably half of the number have to do solely with the construction of special statutes, so special as to throw no real light upon general principles of construction. The main sources of legal learning upon this subject are, of course, the recently adjudged cases, especially those arising out of the contests in South Africa. These Mr. Forsyth has treated in the notes appended to the chapter, and the consequence is that the text and the notes have no connection with one another, except in name. The same inequality runs through the whole book; indeed, some of the opinions printed are almost ridiculous in their triviality. For instance, on page 53, we find an opinion of Sir J. Dodson, Sir J. Campbell, and Sir R. M. Rolfe, to the effect that they see no objection to a certain instrument which had been sent them, appointing a suffragan Bishop of Montreal. What the form of the instrument was, or what the supposed objections to it, we are not informed. On page 161 we have two very remarkable opinions—remarkable, that is to say, in such a publication. The chapter in which they occur is "On certain Prerogatives of the Crown." The first of them is entitled "Opinion of Mr. Fane on the King's right to Treasure Trove in the Bahamas, 1737." In it he says, as to a case "relating to some treasure found at Providence, by one of the inhabitants;" "If no person can legally prove a property in the treasure found, it will be deemed the property of the Crown." There is not another word. The second opinion is headed "Opinion of the Attorney-General, Sir Edward Northey, on the Queen's right to Royal Fish at New York, 1713." The opinion is simply to the effect that in certain proceedings between the Crown and some inhabitants of New York about the right to take whales, both sides had gone wrong in their pleadings. There is no reason why these opinions should be published; and the admission of such useless matter is, in our judgment, the great fault of the book.

We have said thus much as to the defect of Mr. Forsyth's book; but subject to this and a few other drawbacks, we can speak in very high praise of its merits. The opinions themselves contain matter of great weight, and which may prove of great utility. We would refer our readers in particular to some very valuable opinions on the subject of martial law and the power of courts-martial in chapter 6. The author has not encumbered these opinions with introductory narratives but has left them to speak for themselves; a practice which in general is attended with advantage, and never with any inconvenience, except in the case of one or two opinions which, as they stand, are scarcely intelligible, but which in any case would not be very valuable. And the disquisitions in the form of notes appended to each chapter, though we cannot always agree with their conclusions, are admirably concise, and contain a great mass of useful matter in a very convenient form.

A Manual of Bankruptcy and Imprisonment for Debt under the Bankruptcy and Debtors' Acts, 1869. An Epitome of the Law under those statutes, with a Comparative Table showing the changes made by the new Acts. By G. MANLY WETHERFIELD, Solicitor, author of "A Treatise on Composition Deeds," "The County Court Acts, 1867—9," "County Court Reforms," &c., &c. London: Longman, Green, Reader, & Dyer, 1870.

Mr. Wetherfield's unpretending little work neither calls for, nor, indeed, admits of, any elaborate comment. It professes to do no more than arrange the sections of the new Acts, and call attention to some of the more important changes which they introduce. The arrangement of the sections of the Act seems to us judicious, and the enumeration of changes in the law tolerably, though by no means absolutely, complete. We have no doubt that the book will be found useful by those who are beginning their acquaintance with the Acts. After all, the most important part of all such books is the index, and Mr. Wetherfield's index seems to have been carefully prepared.

COURTS.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Dec. 23.—Mr. Senior Commissioner Holroyd took his seat upon the bench to-day for the last time, and the following addresses were delivered on the occasion.

Mr. Bagley rose and said :—Mr. Senior Commissioner, I have reason to believe that this is the last occasion on which you will preside at a public sitting of this court, and I cannot regard your final departure from that seat which you have so long and so worthily occupied as an occurrence of an ordinary character. You will permit me on the part of the Bar to express our high appreciation of your great public services.

You were appointed to the situation of a judge in this court so far back, I believe, as the year 1831, and you are, therefore, the oldest judge at this moment sitting on the bench of any court of justice in this country.

In the course of that lengthened career you have been called upon, day after day, to decide upon very varied questions of law and fact, in the whole range of both law and equity, and which have been constantly complicated with most important questions of fact. You have also had brought before you, in the first instance, before they were subjected to the consideration of any other courts, various Acts of Parliament, not always framed with the greatest perspicacity. In the discharge of those arduous and important duties you have displayed an unceasing devotion to the performance of your duty, and you have also displayed indefatigable industry and exemplary patience. The result has been that your judicial decisions have always commanded respect, and generally obtained approval. On behalf of the branch of the profession to which I belong, and if I did not see that the other branch of the profession was here distinctly and ably represented, I might say on the part of the whole profession of the law, I express a grateful sense of the kindness, forbearance, and courtesy we have always received from you. Desirous as you have been that right and justice should prevail, I may say that we, none of us can recall that you ever uttered a word inflicting pain or giving offence to anyone who has practised before you. Under these circumstances, it is impossible that we can contemplate the severance of our professional relations with you without regret; but we beg to assure you that you take with you our best wishes, and our earnest wishes that you may have, in your well-earned retirement, health and happiness. With these observations, which I thank you for allowing me the opportunity of making on the part of the Bar, I respectfully bid you farewell.

Mr. Lawrance said :—Your Honour, on behalf of that large and influential branch of the profession to which I have the honour to belong, and to whom my friend, Mr. Bagley has adverted, you will, I am sure, pardon me for saying a few words in addition to those which he has so gracefully and emphatically uttered. I could not discharge the duty I owe to myself, and certainly not to my brother professional men, if I did not coincide in every word my learned friend has said. Brought, as solicitors are, into more direct, and more constant relations with "all sorts and conditions of men," you can readily understand they have a more extended opportunity than the Bar have, of knowing their feelings with respect to a learned judge who, for a period of nearly forty years has presided over what I may be permitted still to term one of the most important mercantile courts in the kingdom. (Hear, hear.) Forty years represent a very considerable portion of a man's life, but forty years upon the judicial bench is almost without example. To speak of the purity and integrity of the bench, is merely to repeat words "familiar in our mouths household words." But an instance in which so vast an amount of legal knowledge—stores accumulated during a series of years—stores I may almost say traditionally derived from that learned judge, your father, whom I remember in the Court of King's Bench, and to see that vast amount of learning applied daily and hourly to cases often of the first magnitude, and often of slight importance, is indeed, a rare example of judicial patience, and judicial perseverance. I may certainly echo the learned counsel's words in that most important particular, that no advocate, be he counsel or solicitor; no suitor, be he creditor or bankrupt, can recall to his mind one single harsh or unkind word, nay, not a single impatient gesture. (Hear, hear.) Although deeply regretting what I may almost call your enforced retirement, for I believe that but for legislative interference, we might still have had you here for some years longer, and deeply deploring your retirement, I cannot but adopt my friend's language and wish you every happiness in your retirement. The words of Shakespeare may be fitly quoted here. You have that

"Which should accompany old age,
As Honour, Love, Obedience—
Troops of friends."

The Commissioner.—Mr. Bagley and gentlemen of the bar, Mr. Lawrance and the solicitors of the court, I most heartily thank you for this kind expression of feeling. It is very gratifying to me to receive such a testimonial from a body of gentlemen so competent to form an opinion of me. I am sensible, however, that my friends, Mr. Bagley and Mr. Lawrance, have commended me very much beyond my real merits. I can only claim credit for an earnest endeavour, during a somewhat lengthened term of service as a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy—namely, thirty-eight years, to do my duty and administer the law justly and impartially. If I have in this succeeded, I have my reward; but I cannot retire from the scene of my labours without acknowledging the obligations I am under, not only to my brother Commissioners, the members of the Bar and the solicitors practising in this court, but also to the registrars and other officers of the court, not forgetting the solicitor's clerks, by whom a great deal of the chamber practice is efficiently done; I therefore have to express my obligation to those different persons for the valuable assistance which I have, from time to time, received in disposing of the business brought before me. Though our professional relations, as has been observed by Mr. Bagley, may speedily be severed, I shall often advert to them with pleasure, and shall continue to take a deep interest in the administration of the law, to which I have devoted so many of the best years of my life. And now, I bid you all farewell, with best wishes for your health and happiness, and uninterrupted success in your professions.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. RUSSELL GOLE, of Lime-street, City, has been appointed a London Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery.

Mr. JOHN WATKINS JOHNSTONE, of Stockport, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

Mr. ALFRED SMITH, of the firm of Messrs. Harrison & Smith, solicitors, of Wakefield, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. JOHN WATSON, solicitor, of Durham, and Deputy Clerk of the Peace for the county, has been elected Clerk to the Magistrates of the Durham division, in the room of Mr. J. W. Hays, resigned. Mr. Watson was admitted to practise as an attorney in the County Palatine of Durham in January, 1855, but received a more general certificate in Michaelmas Term, 1860. He holds several local offices in Durham, among which may be enumerated that of Clerk to the Justices for the Western Division and Clerk to the Committee of Visitors of the County Lunatic Asylum. He is also solicitor to the trustees of Spearman's Charity and also to the governors of Sherburn Hospital.

Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM BARLOW, solicitor, of Accrington, Lancashire, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

With reference to O'Donovan Rossa's election for Tipperary, the Freeman's Journal says:—"Thursday, the 23rd of December, was the last day for petitioning against the return of O'Donovan Rossa as member for Tipperary. No petition having been presented up to or on that day by Mr. Heron, Q.C., or anyone else, the election of O'Donovan Rossa can be dealt with by Parliament only. What course will be taken or result arrived at it is impossible to anticipate, but should Rossa be declared disqualified and his return void, it is stated that a new election must be held."

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

JURISDICTION OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

SIR,—The proposal which I am about to make with respect to the concurrent jurisdiction of the county courts, will, perhaps, startle some of your more timid readers; for I would confer on those courts unlimited jurisdiction over all legal disputes of whatever nature or amount, whether at common law, in equity, in maritime cases, or in bankruptcy. I do not mean by this sweeping assertion that I would substitute the county court for the superior court as the tribunal of first instance in all cases—that is a radical change which I certainly do not recommend, though, as I shall hereafter have occasion to show, it seems to be hinted at as a possible contingency by the “advanced” section of the Jurisdiction Commission. However, it is enough for me to state here, that I contemplate no such legal revolution by my scheme; but I simply wish to give every plaintiff the option of commencing proceedings in the county court, if he or his legal adviser should consider that by so doing he could obtain justice at an earlier date, or at less inconvenience or cost, than by having recourse to the superior court. In order to avoid the possibility of this rule operating prejudicially to the defendant's interest, the superior judges should be empowered, in every case of concurrent jurisdiction, to remove the proceedings into a higher court, at the defendant's instance, provided that his application be supported by an affidavit of merits and an offer of security for costs, and by proof that the case was a proper one, either to be tried by a special jury or to be conducted by leading counsel, or that it involved difficult questions of law, or was on any other special ground unfit to be disposed of by an inferior tribunal. (See 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 90; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 38—44; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, s. 3; and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 6.) Now, I cannot imagine what sensible objection can be urged against the plan here proposed, if it be only correctly understood and carefully considered. The plaintiff, of course, cannot object to it, for it will continue a dead letter so far as he is concerned, unless he prefers the local court to Westminster Hall. Neither will the defendant have any just right to complain, for the plan affords him ample opportunity for protecting his interests. If it be contended that a man sued in a county court in respect of some important matter might not be aware of his power to have the proceedings transferred to a superior court, this objection, such as it is, may be fully met by inserting in the summons a special notice warning the defendant of his rights. If it be argued that county court judges cannot safely be entrusted with powers to determine questions which involve large amounts, the obvious answer is, first, that legal difficulties do not depend on the value of the stake, and that it is quite as easy to try a cause for £1,000 as for £5; next, that the jurisdiction contended for would, in practice, be confined almost exclusively to simple cases; and, lastly, that for years past the Courts have actually exercised a jurisdiction almost equally extensive without any complaint being made against them. I allude here to the jurisdiction by consent, which is conferred on the courts by section 23 of the Act of 1856. That section enacts in substance, that the county courts may try any action at common law, “if both parties shall agree, by a memorandum signed by them or their respective attorneys,” to give them jurisdiction. It may seem strange at first sight that, in the face of the above enactment, I should deem further legislation on the subject necessary. But the truth is, that although I have no fault to find with the extent of jurisdiction conferred, I have every fault to find with the mode of conferring it. When litigants are about to settle their disputes in a court of justice, they are neither of them in a frame of mind to consent to an amicable agreement in the shape of a written and signed memorandum. It is only among what Lord Byron used to call “the champions of the fisty ring,” that men shake hands before they begin a fray, and one is, therefore, not surprised to find from the statistical returns, that in the year 1868, thirty-three plaintiffs, and in the year 1867, eleven plaintiffs were all that were entered in the 521 county courts “by agreement above £50.” To understand these figures aright, it must be borne in mind that the county courts dispose of nearly a million of plaintiffs in the course of a year, and that about 11,000 of that number are entered for sums ranging from £20 to £50. A sudden fall in a popular court from 11,000 to 33 annual plaintiffs is an event sufficiently striking to attract attention; and a law that can produce such a result is one which, prima facie at least, requires amendment. I contend that this law is, in fact, illusory. It has been tried for many years, and it has utterly failed. Surely, then, I am justified in advocating its immediate repeal, and the substitution of a more efficient rule in its place. Experience has proved that to make the jurisdiction of the county courts dependent on the active consent of both litigants in a lawsuit, is a mere delusion; and I, therefore, submit with confidence that all which can be reasonably expected or required is, that the local tribunal shall not have jurisdiction unless the one party actively and the other passively consents, or a superior judge shall express an opinion that the case is fit to be dealt with by the county court.

The adoption of such a rule as this would, I am persuaded, be productive of very beneficial results. At present the courts at Westminster are clogged to such an extent that it is often difficult, if not impossible, for the judges to get properly through the work before them. Some heavy causes are made remanets; some are burked by a forced compromise; while others are handed over to different arbitrators on the back benches, who, enjoying ample leisure, and being paid by the “sitting,” have no pressure upon them to make either speedy or cheap awards. In many an important suit, therefore, the litigants have scant reason for satisfaction; and what renders their position the more vexatious is, that, while they are being thus victimised in one form or other, the costly abilities of our great luminaries of the law are being constantly used up in trying causes not a whit more difficult than the simplest plaintiffs which come before the county courts. The golden rule of the satirist, “Nec Deus intersit, nisi dignus vindice nodus,” is nowhere so systematically set at nought as in our courts of Nisi Prius; and the main object which I have in view is to palliate, if not to remedy, the evils which arise from thus disregarding a maxim founded on common sense. Only permit plaintiffs to have recourse to the county court without limit as to the amount of the claim, and a large proportion of the ordinary actions for goods sold and delivered, for money lent, and for work and labour, would soon cease to block up the current of justice at Westminster, and the judges would gain comparative leisure to unravel “the weightier matters of the law.”

But it is not only with respect to causes which actually come to trial, that an increase of jurisdiction in county courts would operate beneficially. Take, for example, “The Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855,” which we owe to the enlightened advocacy of Mr. Justice Keating. This Act, in section 9, empowers her Majesty, by Order in Council, to extend to other than the superior courts the salutary provisions of the statute, and consequently they have been extended to the county courts. But how? Merely by directing that such courts shall deal with bills and notes, “where the plaintiff claims a sum not exceeding £50.” What object can be gained by this limitation of the jurisdiction? In actions on negotiable instruments, not one per cent. of the number is capable of defence. Then why should not the holder of a note for £100 or £1,000 enjoy the same facilities for obtaining judgment and execution as the holder of a note for £50. In the one case the plaintiff, who perhaps lives in Manchester or Bristol has simply to proceed to the county court, take out a plaint, and pay the summons fee, when an officer of the court will henceforth do the needful. In the other he has, almost of necessity, to apply to his solicitor, who must apply, in turn, to his London agent, and every step will be taken by or through the one or the other or both of these expensive middle-men. The result of such circumlocution is a clear loss of time, of money, and of trouble, without any one corresponding benefit to balance these evils.

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

STAMPS ON BUILDING LEASES.

Sir.—The following is a copy of a notice issued by the Board of Inland Revenue, on the 25th November last, on this subject:—

"The Commissioners consider that, in future, all building leases containing covenants to build, or in consideration of a house having been built, must, in addition to ad valorem duty on the rent, be chargeable with thirty-five shillings, as for 'a separate lease in consideration of such covenants,' the charge arising, as it is considered, under the latter part of the 16th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83.

"It is also considered that a lease containing a covenant to improve, and, if necessary, rebuild, &c., &c., is liable to that additional duty 'as for a separate lease in consideration of such covenant.'"

The Act referred to came into operation in October, 1854; a period of fifteen years has, therefore, been permitted to elapse, during which, according to the views now taken by the Commissioners, many thousands of leases must have been insufficiently stamped. That this is an entirely new light which has burst in upon the Commissioners is evidenced by the fact that, in 1865, we applied to the board for an adjudication stamp on a lease in which the precise question arose, and obtained it without having to affix the thirty-five shilling stamp.

The notice, it will be observed, only intimates that, in future, all leases containing covenants to build or improve should have a thirty-five shilling stamp in addition to the ad valorem duty, but says nothing about the past; it is to be hoped, therefore, that the Commissioners contemplate obtaining an Act to remedy the error into which they and the legal profession have fallen, if their view of the Act is correct.

They, no doubt, however, feel that, before applying for an Act, it will be necessary to have a judicial decision upon the point, as the Court of Exchequer may possibly differ from them, as they have from their former selves, and it was probably with this view that they sounded the alarm by issuing the notice we have quoted.

The question, therefore (assuming that some remedy will be applied as regards leases already executed), is not so important as to the past as it is for the future, for, if the construction of the Board is correct, building operations, and especially of houses of an inferior class, will be greatly discouraged. An addition of thirty-five shillings to the expense of every lease would be felt by builders, whether in a large or small way, and particularly in cases in which a separate lease may be required for each house.

An inflexible duty of thirty-five shillings would also be in a great majority of cases greatly out of proportion to the ad valorem duty. In the case, for instance, of a building lease for ninety-nine years, reserving a ground rent of £10 (which is far above the average) the ad valorem duty would only be 6s. or within a fraction of one-sixth of the extra duty required. But the law, as now laid down by the Commissioners, not only applies to building leases but to all leases, however short the term containing covenants, which, in the opinion of the Stamp Office, may come within the category of "a further or other consideration" for the lease, so that a covenant to rebuild in case of fire, or even a covenant to paint, &c., every seven years or during the last year of a term, or a covenant to leave a farm in a certain state of cultivation, or to lay down arable land to pasture, or for other purposes arising out of any special arrangement between the parties might come within the operation of the rule; indeed, as the consideration for all leases is either expressed or implied to be the rent, and the covenants contained in the lease on the part of the lessee, it will be necessary in every case to look to the covenants themselves to ascertain whether they are of such a nature as to require the thirty-five shilling stamp in addition to the ad valorem duty, and as few solicitors will take upon themselves the responsibility of deciding what covenants bring each particular case within the rule and what do not, the result will be that they will either affix the thirty-five shilling stamp or incur the trouble and expense of obtaining adjudication stamps, for be it observed an adjudication stamp only applies to the particular deed to which it is affixed, and will not give validity to other leases, though containing precisely the same provisions, in the event of the Commissioners putting an erroneous construction upon the law applicable to the case.

The question is so important, that it seems to us desirable that some combined measure should be adopted in order to obtain a judicial decision upon the point without delay, and with the ultimate view, if the decision should be unfavourable, of applying to Parliament for relief in the event, which we cannot anticipate, of her Majesty's Government omitting to bring forward a remedial measure; and also with the view, in case of any measure being brought forward, of promoting any amendments which may appear desirable.

A judicial decision could easily be obtained by presenting a lease containing covenants to build, for adjudication, and appealing to the Exchequer under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, s. 15 from the decision of the board. The expenses would not be heavy, and if a few landlords and builders interested in the question would agree to share them, they would fall very light when divided. The principal expense, indeed, would be the fees to counsel.

We shall be happy to put ourselves in communication with any persons who will address us under cover to A. B. & Co., care of Mr. Anderson, Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane, London.

A. B. & Co.

THE OVEREND AND GURNEY PROSECUTIONS.

Sir,—The publication of my letter to the Times in your columns last week, accompanied with criticisms of an injurious tendency, induces me to request your candid perusal of the enclosed statement of facts, and to hope that you will, in the spirit of fair play, and in the interests of our common profession, absolve me in this week's JOURNAL from the charge so offensively prefixed to your comments. So far from any design of "puffing" actuating me, I withheld my name throughout the proceedings as conducting the prosecution, which there is every probability would have fallen through, to the scandal and reproach of our national credit and jurisprudence, if I had not responded to the call at the eleventh hour.

I rely upon your candour and justice to make the amende honorable in your next impression, as it is too bad to have such invidious remarks made as a sequel to a matter of such public import, and in which the principal worker, having been made a cat's-paw of, has reaped neither praise nor profit; while the honour and privileges of the profession demand your impartial and jealous guardianship.

29th December, 1869.

A FAIR RING AND NO FAVOUR.

Sir,—In seconding Mr. C. T. Saunders's paper, published in your last week's number, on the "union of the two branches of the profession," I would ask leave to point to the exclusive audience accorded to barristers at some of the criminal courts, and especially at quarter sessions, as illustrating, in a superlative degree, the need for reform. Let me call in the aid of "That smoothed-faced gentleman, tickling commodity,

The bias of the world."

and appeal to our governing class, the almighty ratepayers, and the present exceedingly-economical Government, not to permit any longer an expenditure of the county funds, in the shape of fees to counsel for the prosecution, where such an outlay is unnecessary. I am not alluding particularly to such a gigantic case as that of the Overend & Gurney prosecution, which Mr. Saunders thinks would have been better conducted by an attorney, but rather to the great bulk of small and trifling cases, in many of which the briefs (consisting merely of copies of the depositions) are made, each of them assisted by an enormous heading, to pretend to run over a single brief sheet. Do the ratepayers know why so many guineas (plus clerks' fees) have been kindly presented out of their pockets with these briefs? Because, forsooth, an exercise of their generosity was required to provide a nursery for members of the bar, in whom, exclusively of attorneys, forensic talent

"Yet unborn, perhaps,
Lay hidden, as the music of the moon
Sleeps in the plain eggs of the nightingale," which required development!

At a season when the already heavily-burdened farmer is threatened with further imposts for the necessary education of the poorest of the poor, it is worthy of his consideration whether he should not seek to remove the tax he pays towards the mental advancement of sons of noblemen and others—the wealthiest of the wealthy.

Again, the exclusive system works hardly upon a prisoner in the matter of his defence who, but for the practice, might fairly have, through his attorney, for one guinea, that assistance which can now scarcely ever be afforded him, with decency, under £5, usually a prohibitory amount altogether. Surely that influence which attorneys are popularly supposed to possess in elections must be altogether a myth, or they would, ere this, have climbed the barrier which, at present, "shuts them up," a degraded race of mortals, in all the principal courts of justice.

AN ADVOCATE.

Sir,—In the case of Baker v. Wait, coram Vice-Chancellor James, reported in the Weekly Reporter of the 25th inst., p. 185, I observe that it appears to have been doubted, though not fully discussed nor decided, whether there was any power to administer interrogatories in an equity suit in the county court. I think there is, and succeeded about twelve months ago in so convincing the registrar of the Liverpool County Court. The occasion was a suit for the administration of the trusts of an assignment for the benefit of creditors registered only under the 194th section, when I obtained leave before the hearing to administer interrogatories to the defendant. The grounds for my application will suit equally an application to interrogate the plaintiff, and they are simply these:—1. The County Court Equitable Jurisdiction Act, and the rules made thereunder contain nothing to show that interrogatories and answers are intended to be avoided. 2. Rule 80 of the County Court Common Law Rules of 1867 contains provisions for enabling either party to interrogate the other party, and upon the necessary affidavit being made the granting an order appears to be compulsory on the registrar. 3. Rule 27 of the 23rd County Court Order in Equity 1867 says "the rules, and forms, and practice in actions in the county courts shall, subject to these orders, be adapted with reference to suits and proceedings in equity so far as they shall be respectively applicable."

The matter has not, I think, yet come under judicial decision, and as it is obvious that in many county court equity suits interrogatories would be of great service to the parties, perhaps you or some of your readers would like to state suggestions or experience on the subject.

Liverpool, Dec. 27.

J. J. Y.

Sir,—A short time ago appeared in a provincial paper a letter from a correspondent, I presume an "accountant," or some person of that description, coolly taking to task the judge of the local county court for not admitting accountants, &c., to conduct cases in these courts on behalf of others, and impudently asserting that the doing so was in direct contravention of the law; saying in effect, in support of his opinion, that the judges were obliged to allow a hearing not only to barristers and attorneys but also to "any other persons."

I waited some time to see if any member of the profession would take the trouble to give the writer of such an objectionable letter, the "setting down" which he so well deserved; but, unfortunately, the only gentleman who attempted it was, as I think, about as little fitted for the task as he well could be, for he made bad worse, as you will see. He did not attack the letter in the spirit of contempt which was appropriate to it, but met it with quiet counter assertions, the chief one of which was, as I conceive, bad law; for as his greatest point he told the writer of the letter that unqualified persons were precluded from acting as advocates in the county courts by virtue of the 35th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

Roused (perhaps foolishly) by the cause of the profession being defended in such a lame way, I wrote a letter not so much to explain the law of advocacy in the county courts, as to castigate "accountants" and the whole tribe of sham lawyers, for their impudent assumption. In the course of my letter, though I did touch upon the question of "advocacy," for I pointed out to the unprofessional correspondent that he must be either very ignorant or very disingenuous to assert that unqualified persons had a right by law to appear in the county courts as advocates, when such law provided that leave of the judge must first be obtained, a provision which made all the difference between his bad law, and the real law on the point, I also said the professional antagonist to the writer of the letter was a "poor hand" at his work to quote the 6 & 7 Vict. in support of his opposite views, when that Act was passed years before the present county courts had an existence conferred upon them.

This letter brought another from each of the persons I have named; the non-professional rudely persisting in saying unqualified persons had a right to appear in the county courts, and still impudently passing by the provision as to leave of the judge, which I had pointed out; this was of no consequence as the kind of correspondent was evident, and it did not signify what he said.

The professional correspondent, though, replied also, and will it be believed he on his part persisted in quoting 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, as applying to the present subject, and as a "clencher" referred the public in refutation of my views to the 36th section of that Act which he said mentioned the county courts?

Now, as in my ignorance I cannot conceive any member of the profession being so uninformed as not to know that the 36th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, as well as the 35th, refers not to the present county courts but to the ancient county courts, co-existent with the constitution of the kingdom or nearly so, I should consider the persistence in such a line of argument to make me appear wrong a most detestable piece of Jesuitism, only I have lived long enough not to make too "cocksure" of anything; and I should be obliged to you, or any of your readers, if they will state in your journal whether, by any possible construction, the provisions of the 35th or 36th section of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, with regard "to the court commonly called the county court" can possibly be brought to bear on the right of advocacy in the present county courts. DUCENS.

[Our correspondent's view is clearly correct. The right to appear in the county courts has always been governed solely by the County Court Acts, formerly by section 91 of the County Courts Act, 1846, and now partly by it and partly by section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1852. The persons entitled to appear are the party himself, the attorney acting in the cause, a barrister, or, by leave of the judge, any other person allowed by the judge to appear instead of the party. If the person who claimed to appear in the case referred to was a person attempting to act as an attorney and for payment, we think not only that the judge was not bound to hear him, but that under the statutes in force he had no right to do so. The meaning of the section appears to us to be that a suitor may hire an advocate, who shall be either a barrister or the attorney in the cause, or if there be any reason why he should not hire an advocate, and he cannot appear in person, the judge may admit some other person to appear for him, an unpaid person being clearly meant. Section 91 of the County Courts Act, 1846, the very section which first introduced the "any other person," expressly says, "No person not being an attorney admitted, &c., shall be entitled to have or recover any sum of money for appearing or acting on behalf of any other person in the said court." This throws some light upon the kind of "other persons" meant. They are certainly not unqualified persons attempting to practise as attorneys.—Ed. S. J.]

The issue of the new rules and orders is anxiously looked for, as the construction to be placed upon various portions of the Act may greatly depend upon the rules and orders. It is expected that the Chief Judge (Mr. Commissioner Bacon) will take his seat in the new court of Lincoln's-inn-fields in the course of a few weeks, and appeals will be heard before him. The arrears will probably be disposed of by the registrars, and a great accumulation of old business will have to be worked off. A number of fresh cases have been fixed for hearing in May next, and it is supposed that the arrears cannot be got rid of in less than a year. The new business will be allotted to the Chief Judge, who will in all probability sit here on the 1st of January for the despatch of pending business, but early in the month sittings will be held in the court of Lincoln's-inn-fields. Commissioners Holroyd and Winslow will retire on full pay.—Standard.

SUPREME COURT.

Helme v. Life Insurance Company.

1. A custom among life insurance companies to allow thirty days' grace for the payment of premiums, notwithstanding a clause of forfeiture for non-payment on the day they become due exists in the policy, is valid to interpret the contract, and may be proven by the insured.

2. Evidence that the practice of the company was to give notice of the time at which the premiums fell due, and that they omitted to do so on the occurrence of the default in question, or that they so dealt with the insured as to put her off her guard, is admissible as evidence, from which the jury may draw the conclusion that the insured was misled by the company, the company cannot take advantage of a default which they have themselves contributed to or encouraged.

Error to the District Court of Philadelphia.

Opinion by THOMPSON, C.J.

The plaintiff below offered on the trial to prove a custom among life insurance companies to allow thirty days' grace for payment of premiums due, even where a clause of forfeiture for non-payment at the day exists. The rejection of the offer by the court forms the first bill of exceptions and assignments of error to be considered in this case.

It might have been a difficult thing to prove such a custom, but that was not a good ground on which to refuse the offer. It was the plaintiff's right to prove it if she could, and we are to take it, for the purposes of this investigation, that she could have proved it. Would it have been effectual proof for any purpose, had it been admitted?

We think it would, although generally a contract is the law of the transaction in which it exists, and is not to be affected by anything but its terms: that is to say, it cannot be abridged or enlarged in its scope by anything else; yet there are many cases in which its execution is materially controlled by usage or custom. A familiar instance are days of grace on commercial paper. By a custom grown into law, it is not due until the expiration of three days after it purports to be; or rather the remedy is suspended against the parties for that period. So in agriculture, although the lease may fix the duration of the term, and when it is to end, yet the tenant by custom has rights on the premises after it is ended, to harvest and carry away, his share of what the custom calls the way-going crop. 5 Bin. 295; 2 S. & R. 14; Doug. 201; 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 6th ed. 470. This custom seems to do more than control the remedy; it in fact delays the contract. But no custom is more perfectly established, or more completely stands on a solid foundation as law. There are customs which interpret marine contracts to the extent of apparent changes in them. In Peake's Nisi Prius 43, in the case Charand v. Augersteen, it was shown that by custom, a stipulation in a policy of insurance, that a vessel was to sail in October, meant that she was to sail between the 25th of the month and the 1st or 2nd of November.

While a custom as a general rule may not be heard to affect the terms of a statute, nor a contract, to the extent of delaying or abridging the force of it, it may interpret either. Repp v. Palmer, 3 W. 178.

The offer in this case was to control the generality of the clause of forfeiture in the policy in case of non-payment of premiums at the day, and to show that a forfeiture was not demandable at the day, nor at all, if paid within thirty days. If the plaintiff could have established this as a custom, her case would on this point have been clear of difficulty, for the testimony was that she had tendered the premium for the non-payment of which the forfeiture was claimed once and perhaps twice within a month, after it was due by the terms of the policy. We do not know whether there is or is not such a custom. That is not our question at this time, the plaintiff offered to prove it, and the testimony should have been admitted in our opinion. This error is therefore sustained.

Besides this, we think there was evidence in the case for the jury on other aspects of it. If it was the practice of the company to notify the plaintiff of the times her premiums were due and payable, and they omitted it on the occasion of this default, or if they so dealt with her as to induce a belief that the clause of forfeiture would not be insisted on in her case in case of a dereliction of payment at the day, and it was declared that the only risk she ran in not paying at the precise time was death occurring in the interval of non-payment of over-due premiums, and thus put her off her guard, they ought not to be permitted to take advantage of a default which they may themselves have encouraged. That was an aspect of the case in proof, upon which the jury should have been allowed to pass. In transactions of this nature it is easy to be misled by a practice of liberality, if followed by one of entire strictness, and the only cure for this is the inquiry by the jury whether the party has been misled by the former. If so, it is a fraud upon her rights which ought to be condemned and redressed. The cases of Buckley v. The United States Insurance Company, 18 Barb. 541, and Reese v. Insurance Company, 26 Barb. 556, strongly sustain this view. In this manner a course of strictness may take place, and it is not to be doubted that the company may waive a positive compliance with the rules of insurance. 9 Casey, 397; 2 Wr. 250; 4 Ib. 311; 5 Ib. 161; 7 Ib. 250; 8 Ib. 259; 10 Ib. 323. Forfeitures are odious in law, and are enforced only where there is the clearest evidence that that was what was meant by the stipulations of the parties. There must be no cast of management or trickery to estop the party into a forfeiture. If the strictness in this case was the result of a desire to wind up business, as we learn the company did, not long thereafter, and it was adopted to avoid a return of premiums, the least which could be said of it is, that it was a most discreditable transaction. We do not know how this was. At the same time it is singular that absolute strictness should be required in paying premiums, if the company had it in contemplation to cease insuring and to return the premiums to parties who had regularly paid them, as they would be obliged to do. There is undoubtedly a comity at least extended to all insurers in regard to the matter of paying premiums. No company would be worthy to receive the countenance of the public, which should establish a practice that would for every little dereliction forfeit the policies of the insured, even if it had the power.

We think the learned judges erred in awarding a non-suit, as well as in a rejecting the proffered testimony, and that the non-suit must be set aside and a procedendo awarded; which is done accordingly.

OBITUARY.

MR. P. G. ELLISON.

The Newcastle Chronicle reports the death of Mr. Peregrine George Ellison, a local solicitor, which took place at his residence there on the 13th December. Mr. Ellison was the senior member in point of standing in the legal profession of Newcastle, having commenced to practise there in 1810, in Hilary Term of which year he was certificated as a solicitor. At the outset of his career he enjoyed a respectable though not extensive practice, and his high character won the confidence and respect of his clients. Being in easy circumstances Mr. Ellison did not latterly follow up his professional practice, but took an active share in contested elections, when his services were invariably secured as deputy-sheriff at one of the polling-booths. The deceased gentleman was one of the few surviving members of the volunteer corps formed in the early part of the present century during the height of the French war. Mr. Ellison was born on the 31st August, 1787, and had, therefore, attained his eighty-second year; he married, in 1818, Mary, daughter of Mr. Frederick Horn, by whom he leaves three children. One of his daughters is the widow of the late Mr. Henry William Fenwick, solicitor, of Newcastle.

MR. WILLIAM BAINBRIDGE, J.P.

We have to announce the death of Mr. William Bainbridge, Barrister-at-Law, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, who expired on the 13th December, at his residence, Cliff House, Cullercoates, at the age of about sixty years. The deceased gentleman was the only son of Mr. William Bainbridge, senior partner of the firm of Messrs. Robert & William Bainbridge, old-established solicitors of Alston, in Northumberland, where the family is still represented by Mr. U. Bainbridge, the son of the senior member of the late firm. The late Mr. W. Bainbridge was educated at a north-country school, and having finished his studies at the University of Cambridge, he was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in November, 1838. He soon after joined the Northern Circuit, but confined himself, after making a few appearances at Quarter Sessions, to chamber practice as a conveyancing and real property lawyer, in which branch of the profession he acquired considerable celebrity. Mr. Bainbridge soon after published a book, which his local experience in the mining district of Alston peculiarly qualified him to write—namely, "A Treatise on the Law of Mines and Minerals." This work went through three editions, the last of which appeared about two years since. Mr. Bainbridge was possessed of considerable literary ability, and delivered a course of lectures at Newcastle on the Crusades, which were characterised by much dramatic power. He also wrote and published anonymously a novel, in three volumes, entitled "Lionel Mervel." In 1857, on the collapse of the Northumberland and Durham District Bank, he was one of the four gentlemen chosen to represent and watch the interests of the shareholders and creditors. About two years ago he was placed on the Commission of the Peace for the county of Northumberland, and was very regular in his attendance at the weekly petty sessions held at Tyne-mouth. He leaves a widow and young family.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.

Hilary Term.

The examiners appointed for the intermediate examination of persons under articles of clerkship to attorneys have appointed Thursday, the 20th January, for the examination. Candidates for examination are to attend on that day at half-past nine in the forenoon, at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely, and close at four o'clock.

Articles, &c., must be left with the secretary on or before Thursday, the 6th instant; and, in case articles and testimonials of service have been already deposited, they should be re-entered, the fee paid, and the answers completed on or before the 6th instant.

Candidates applying to be examined under the 4th section of the Attorneys Act, 1860, may, on application, obtain copies of the further questions relating to the ten years' service antecedent to the articles of clerkship; and such questions, duly answered, must be left with the articles, &c., on or before the 6th instant.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

The examiners appointed for the examination of persons applying to be admitted attorneys have appointed Tuesday, the 18th, and Wednesday, the 19th January, as the days for the examination. Candidates for examination are to attend on those days, at half-past nine in the forenoon of each day, at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely, and close at four o'clock.

Articles, &c., must be left with the secretary on or before Monday, the 10th January. If the articles were executed after the 1st January, 1861, the certificate of having passed the Intermediate Examination should be left at the same time; and, in case articles and testimonials of service have been already deposited, they should be re-entered, the fee paid, and the answers completed on or before the 10th instant.

Candidates applying to be examined under the 4th section of the Attorneys Act, 1860, may, on application, obtain copies of the further questions relating to the ten years' service antecedent to the articles of clerkship; and such questions, duly answered, must be left with the articles, &c., on or before the 10th instant.

Where the articles have not expired, but will expire during the term, or in the vacation following such term, the candidate may be examined conditionally; but the articles must be left on or before the 10th instant, and answers up to that time.

On the first day of examination papers will be delivered to each candidate, containing questions to be answered in writing, classed under the several heads of—1. Preliminary; 2. Common and Statute Law, and Practice of the Courts; 3. Conveyancing.

On the second day, further papers will be delivered to each candidate, containing questions to be answered in—4. Preliminary; 5. Equity, and Practice of the Courts; 6. Bankruptcy, and Practice of the Courts; 7. Criminal Law, and Proceedings before Justices of the Peace.

Each candidate is required to answer all the preliminary questions (Nos. 1 and 4); and also to answer in three of the other heads of inquiry—viz., Common Law, Conveyancing, and Equity. The examiners will continue the practice of proposing questions in Bankruptcy and in Criminal Law and Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, in order that candidates who have given their attention to these subjects may have the advantage of answering such questions, and having the correctness of their answers in those departments taken into consideration in summing up the merit of their general examination.

Candidates who have already proved to the satisfaction of the examiners the ten years' antecedent service are not required to leave replies to the further questions again.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The demand for money, as is usual at the close of the year, has been fair throughout the week, somewhat greater than it was a short time back. But the supply is abundant; when the transactions incident to the close of the quarter are fully concluded, the demand is likely to slacken.

The prices of public securities have ruled steady throughout the week, and this firmness is fully maintained. In foreign stocks and in railway and other like investments there has been little to notice, last week's prices having been on the whole maintained.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS ACT.—In order to carry out the provisions of the Habitual Criminals Act of last session, a circular has, we believe, been sent to the chief constables and other chief police officers in England and Wales, directing them to send weekly to the registrar of habitual criminals a return of all criminals convicted during the previous week in their respective districts of any offence specified in the schedule of the Act. Prisoners under remand or committed for trial are not to be returned until their cases are finally disposed of by magistrates or judges. If any information is required respecting any suspicious person in custody, any particulars known at the Habitual Criminals Office will be immediately forwarded on application. In all cases of information or reference, the names and aliases and register number of the criminal are, if possible, to be stated. The following crimes, among others, are included in the list of those to which the Act is applicable:—Treason felony, shooting, stabbing, cutting and wounding with intent, manslaughter, child stealing, feloniously throwing over the person a corrosive fluid, burglary, breaking into dwelling-houses and stealing or intending to steal, breaking into shops, &c., highway robbery, assaults with intent to rob, church robbing, cattle stealing, horse stealing, sheep stealing, larceny, fraud, conspiracy, dog stealing, embezzlement, receiving stolen goods, arson, forging, coining, uttering counterfeit coin, Juvenile Offenders' Acts, being at large under sentence of penal servitude, threatening by letter to extort money, &c., &c. This is a pretty good bill of fare, and there can be little doubt that if a correct list of gentlemen who indulge in these evil practices is kept by the police it will not improve the position of the former, and will materially facilitate the operations of the latter.—Pull Mall Gazette.

HILARY TERM.—In the Queen's Bench there are 54 new trial rules, 11 enlarged rules, and 38 special cases and demurrers. In the Common Pleas, 25 rules for new trials, 5 enlarged rules, 1 case for judgment, 37 matters entered in the special paper, and 6 registration appeals. In the Exchequer there are 7 errors and appeals, 1 rule in the peremptory paper, and 20 in the special paper; whilst in the new trial list there are 4 for judgment, and 25 for arguments.

The Police Committee of the Oxford Town Council have recommended that the salary of the magistrates' clerk (which office has been rendered vacant by the demise of Mr. Henry Jacobs) should be £150 per annum, and that the judicial fees be paid over to the police fund. They have also proposed that the table of fees be revised, and submitted to the Secretary of State, and that the clerk be required to give his personal services, and not by deputy or clerk.

The Waterford election petition will be tried before Baron Hughes, at Waterford, on the 27th of January.

NEWSPAPERS.—The Italians led the way in the publication of newspapers, under the title of Gazzetta; and the first English newspaper, of which there are many copies in the British Museum, was entitled "The English Mercurie," published in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and "imprinted at London by her highness printer, 1588."

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, JANUARY, 8, 1870.

WE ARE EXTREMELY GLAD to observe that the following notice has been posted in the Worship-street Police Court:—

“On and after January 1, 1870, no person will be permitted in any way to practise at this Court except those entitled by law to do so, viz.:—1. Barristers-at-law; 2. Attorneys or solicitors; 3. Persons specially authorised by statute to conduct certain cases before magistrates. But the articled clerk to an attorney or solicitor will be allowed to represent his principal upon producing a written request that he may be permitted to do so, and upon his satisfying the presiding magistrate that the absence of such attorney or solicitor is unavoidable. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

(Signed) C. E. ELLISON. } Magistrates.
R. M. NEWTON.

This step deserves to be followed in all the police courts. The Worship-street magistrates deserve praise for having thus rid their court of those disreputable and very undesirable advocates who infest police courts, “touting” for leave to appear.

IN CONSEQUENCE of the difference of opinion on the part of county court judges as to the construction of section 5 of the “Debtors Act, 1869,” the Treasury have taken the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on the point. We commented on the subject when these differences first arose (ante 107), and it is with some degree of satisfaction we find the law officers confirming the opinion we then expressed. The questions put by the Treasury are the following, the “case” being dated December 24th:—

“If warrant of commitment issued after the 31st inst., will the arrest of the debtor thereunder be valid? If debtor be arrested on an order made on a judgment summons issued before the 31st inst, but returnable after that day, will the arrest be valid?”

The following is the answer to these questions:—

“We are of opinion that in each of the cases put the arrest will be valid if the order is in conformity with the provisions of the ‘Debtors Act, 1869,’ which are substituted by clause 5 for the provisions of the ‘County Courts Act, 1846,’ otherwise not. We presume that a large number, probably the greater number, of the orders now made by the county court judges are in conformity with the new statute, so as to be valid under it as if it were now in operation. We do not think, upon the whole, it was intended by that statute to invalidate such orders though made before it comes into operation; but the words of the first paragraph of the section are strong and clear, and we give this opinion not without considerable hesitation. (Signed) R. P. COLLIER.
Temple, Dec. 29. J. D. COLERIDGE.”

THE CHAMBERS OF THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS and the three Vice-Chancellors were formally opened for business yesterday morning at eleven o'clock. Before the chief clerks there were in the aggregate 216 summons, distributed as follows:—Before Mr. Church, 19; Mr. Hawkins, 10; Mr. Marshall, 18; Mr. Hall, 14; Mr. Peake, 24; Mr. Church, 29; Mr. Edwards, 7; Mr. Buckley, 21; Mr. Pritchard, 17; Mr. Leman, 19; Mr. Bloxam, 19; Mr. Allen, 19.

IN THE CURRENT NUMBER OF THE Weekly Reporter is reported a decision of the Master of the Rolls, in the matter of the Heyford Iron Works Company, which appears to us to be of especial importance at the present time, having regard to the recent decisions of the Lord Justice Giffard in Drummond's Case, (18 W. B. 2, and Pell's Case, ib. 31. The question in all three cases was in effect the same—namely, whether a subscriber of the memorandum of association is entitled to substitute nominally fully paid-up shares for the shares which, by the act of subscription, he engages to take and pay for. In Migotti's Case, (15 W. R. 731), the subscriber took fully paid-up shares from the promoter, and that was held not to satisfy the obligation. Migotti's Case has, we believe, never been doubted, and in the opinion of the Lord Justice, was “most correctly decided.” His Lordship has introduced a distinction between cases where fully paid-up shares are taken under an agreement with a third party, as in Migotti's Case, and cases where the agreement is with the Company, as in Pell's and Drummond's Cases. This distinction however, the Master of the Rolls considers to be too thin to be acted on.

“In construing Acts of Parliament, said Sir Samuel Romilly (16 Ves. 335), there are two directions to be attended to; the first, which is the safest, to find out the general object of the Legislature; secondly, to see what sort of construction has been put upon the Act in other cases.” If we may be allowed to adopt this statement, it can hardly, we think, be doubted, that the general object of the Legislature, when requiring that the memorandum should be signed by seven or more persons, for at least one share a-piece, and that every subscriber should set down opposite to his name the number of shares he takes, was to give the public some notion of the extent of the resources of the company, and the stake of its respective promoters. People were entitled to consider it as guaranteed that so much capital, at all events, as was subscribed for would be forthcoming for the purposes of the company, and as a security to creditors. This safety must wholly fail, if subscribers are to be allowed to substitute nominally fully paid-up shares, however such may have been obtained, for shares not described as fully paid-up on the face of the memorandum of association. This is a point that creditors will do well to look into, if Pell's Case was correctly decided. In the Heyford Company's Case several of the seven subscribers, who were, in fact, the company, agreed with themselves—for that was the true effect of the arrangement—that the nominally fully paid-up shares to be allotted to one of them under an agreement of prior date should be distributed among themselves in discharge of the obligation incurred by them to take shares on which nothing had been paid. Yet the arrangement, so far as regards the original allottee, was sanctioned in Pell's Case.

We are glad to see that the Master of the Rolls expressed a wish that the appeal, if there should be an appeal, might be heard by the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justice. Cases of this importance should have a chance of being considered by more than one judge when they come before an appellate tribunal—which, so long as the vacancy continues in the Court of Appeal, against the existence of which we have so often protested, can seldom be the case. The proverb, "Two heads are better than one," is a proverb which most people believe to be true. At all events, nothing can be more inconsistent than the present system, which permits a single judge to hear appeals of one class, but not of another, wholly irrespective of their nicety or importance.

WE HAVE BEEN PROMISED free trade in cabs from and after the 1st of January, and it was supposed that the public would derive much benefit from this. At present, however, it is only clear that the public will suffer several disadvantages, while the benefit is wholly doubtful. The cab-owners, however, profit at once by remission of the hackney carriage duty. By an Act of last session (32 & 33 Vict. c. 115) the licences for cabs were placed under the direction of the Home Secretary, and he was to make regulations for various purposes; amongst others, for fixing the fares, the only restriction being one in favour of the cab proprietors and drivers—viz., that it could not be made compulsory on the driver of any hackney carriage to take passengers at a less fare than that payable at the time of the passing of the Act. The Act came into operation on the 1st of January, and on that day the Home Secretary published his regulations; we believe, however, that they will not come fully into force until the 1st of February, by which time the new licences will have been taken out.

The general nature of the scheme is that the cab-owners, on applying for a licence for each cab, are to name their own rate per mile and per hour, and that the licence is to be granted to them for that rate. When so licensed, the rate so chosen is to be obligatory upon the cab-owner in the same manner that sixpence per mile and two shillings per hour has been obligatory hitherto. These rates are to be written on a metal flag, which is to be exposed to view when the cab is plying for hire. In addition to this, the driver is to be bound to give the hirer a ticket showing the fares for which his cab is licensed. So far, it would appear likely that no great alteration would be made, even if we did not know that the present cab-owners had resolved to apply for licences at the old fares. It is, of course, possible that there may be a certain number of better carriages, provided at a higher fare, which will be for the public benefit. It will be observed, however, that it is only with respect to the unit of fare per mile or per hour that there is to be what is called free trade. Certain regulations are prescribed as to other matters applicable to all cabs, and in these we cannot help thinking the interest of the cab-hiring public has been unnecessarily disregarded. The first of these relates to children. It will be remembered that under the old law sixpence was paid for each person beyond two, but that for this purpose two children under ten years of age counted as one adult person. This was by the schedule to 16 & 17 Vict. c. 33; and it will also be remembered that the Court of Queen's Bench found themselves reluctantly obliged to put on the schedule the construction that one baby in arms was to be paid for as an adult person. Possibly, Mr. Bruce was prevented by the restriction to which we have referred from setting this matter right, as it might have been said that to oblige cabmen to take babies in arms free would have been to require them to take passengers at a less fare than that payable when the Act passed. It was, however, wholly unnecessary for him to have done away, as he seems to have done, with the restriction that two children under ten should count as one adult. He has, however, done worse than simply abolish this restriction, because he has only done it by implication, and in a manner which will certainly give rise to disputes. By the third of the regulations, relating to hackney carriages only, it is provided that every child shall be reckoned as a person within the meaning of the foregoing regulations. The foregoing regulations, however—that is, the first and second—relate only to the number of persons to be carried in the carriage. This, therefore, does not touch the question of fares; we may remark, however, in passing, that it is inconvenient, and wholly unnecessary, to forbid one adult and two children being carried in a hansom cab. Although other regulations deal specially with other cases of fares, such as the fare for waiting and the like, there is none relating in any way to extra persons or to children, except the 12th. That merely provides that the driver shall give the hirer a ticket "in the following form, on which shall be printed," together with other things, "the rates of fares by time and by distance which the driver, according to these regulations, is entitled to demand from the hirer." The form of ticket given, before saying anything about passengers, has the following:—"Children: all children to count as passengers." "Extra persons: for each person above two, for the whole journey, the sum of —." We presume the Secretary of State intends this blank to be filled up with the same figure as the blank left for the rate per mile, so that in the ordinary case it would be sixpence as at present. There is, however, no marginal direction that the blank shall be so filled up. First of all, therefore, we are met by the difficulty that there is no authority in the new regulations for the driver to charge anything at all for extra persons except by the implication (arising out of the 12th rule, which we have quoted) that he may charge the fares printed on the authorised form of ticket, and the authorised form of ticket directs him to charge simply a sum of —. Does this mean that he may charge nothing, or charge anything he likes? Supposing this difficulty got over in the way we have suggested by the blank being filled up by the insertion, in the ordinary case, of "sixpence," or in other cases by whatever may be the unit of rate per mile, we are then met by the further difficulty as to whether the inference arising from this form of ticket, that each child, when more than two persons are carried, may be charged sixpence, is strong enough to override the express stipulation in the schedule to 15 & 16 Vict. This cannot be said to be free from doubt when we consider that it is provided in the Act of last session that all the provisions of the Acts relating to hackney carriages then in force are to remain in force subject to any alteration made by the Act or by regulations of the Secretary of State made under it. We have said enough to show that if, as we believe to be the case, the Secretary of State has imposed an additional charge upon the fathers of twins, he has done it in such a manner that they will have plausible ground for putting, at their own expense, cabmen through a protracted course of litigation in order to enforce it on them. There is also an alteration in the charge for luggage which, though it involves a slight increase of charge, yet is so decidedly in the direction of simplicity that we think it very desirable. For the future every package carried outside is to be charged twopence, independently of all questions of reasonableness and of the number of passengers carried, which have complicated the question hitherto.

There is one other provision of these regulations which deserves comment, and that is to the effect that no cab may ply for hire or be let to hire elsewhere than upon an authorised standing, and if let elsewhere the fare shall not be recoverable. The object of this, of course, is to free the streets from loitering cabs. It is a matter of doubt, however, whether it is desirable to do this at the expense of the considerable inconvenience which in many localities will result to cab-hirers.

It is scarcely likely, however, that this provision will be acted upon to any great extent. There is no penalty attached to the act of letting a cab to hire elsewhere than on an authorised stand, except the forfeiture of the right to the fare. Few persons would be likely to insist upon this when for their own convenience they had hired an empty passing cab, and it is not unlikely that cabmen will habitually rely on this. With regard to the provision, forfeiting the fare, we have some doubt whether it is not ultra vires of the Secretary of State. He has certain powers of imposing penalties, but they are very different from this. We think it would be ultra vires, if it were not that it is little more than declaratory of the law, for the direction that cabs shall not be let elsewhere than on a stand, seems clearly within the powers of the Secretary of State, and that being so, a letting elsewhere would be an illegal contract, which could not be enforced.

Altogether we cannot regard these regulations as skillfully drawn. It is, however, satisfactory that the Home Secretary may alter and amend them from time to time, so that any defects may be remedied immediately by a new order, without the necessity for fresh legislation.

CONSIDERABLE MISAPPREHENSION appears still to exist in the public mind in reference to the new system of collecting the Queen's Taxes. An idea having got abroad that the effect was that the taxes for the quarter from the 1st of January in the present year to the 5th of April would have to be paid twice over, an official statement has been issued with a view of showing that this is not the case. This statement, however, has not satisfied everyone, for a correspondent of the Times, signing himself "C. E. A.," endeavours to show that a portion of the income tax for the year from April, 1869, to April, 1870, will have to be paid twice. His mistake, however, is a very obvious one, for he assumes, contrary to the fact, that half the income tax for that year was collected last October. The two quarters' income tax which, under the old system would have become due last October, did not, however, become due then, and were not in fact collected. If any demand was in any case made for them it must have been owing to the ignorance of some collector who continued without authority to pursue the old system.

It is scarcely likely, however, that any demand was made in October for income tax, except possibly for arrears due on the previous March. "C. E. A." does not, however, say that any demand for income tax was made of him, and it is more probable that he has misunderstood some statement having reference either to the collection of income tax in October under the old system, which was discontinued in October last, or else to the collection of the half year of the assessed taxes in October last, for these were due then as usual, though the income tax was not. There is no pretence for saying that any portion of the income tax, land tax, or inhabited house duty will have to be paid twice. We pointed out some time back that with reference to these taxes the only disadvantage under which the tax-payer will labour, will be that in the first place he will have to pay the tax for the whole year in one sum, and that at a time when he is also called upon for other payments; and in the second place, although the day on which the whole now becomes due will be nearer to that on which the last instalment formerly became due than to that on which the first instalment became due, so that, taking an average the payment of the tax does not become due earlier than it used to do, yet that the tax-payer is likely in practice to be obliged to pay much earlier than he used to do, because he will not get the benefit of the lengthened credit which was formerly given to him in consequence of the difficulty and expense of collecting the various instalments separately as they become due by law.

With regard to the assessed taxes, however, there is much more ground for the public misapprehension, although after all it is but a misapprehension. The official explanation would perhaps have been more satisfactory if it had candidly admitted what is the fact, viz., that in a certain sense payment will have to be made twice for the quarter between the 1st of January and the 5th of April, and then gone on to explain that it is quite fair that this should be so, because one of the payments will be in respect of taxable articles kept in 1868 or 1869, and the other will be in respect of articles kept in 1870. It has been the practice hitherto to speak of the assessed taxes for any particular year when taxes were meant which would be more accurately described as assessed taxes payable in that year for the previous year. Thus, the last assessed taxes under the old system which will have to be paid are the taxes usually described as the assessed taxes for the year from the 5th of April, 1869, to the 5th of April, 1870. It would, however, be better to describe these as the taxes payable between the 5th of April, 1869, and the 5th of April, 1870, for the year from the 5th of April, 1868, to the 5th of April, 1869. When so described few persons would say that it was unjust that they should pay these taxes as well as the assessed taxes in respect of articles kept or to be kept after the 1st of January, 1870. They might, of course, complain of having to pay these taxes for different years at the same time. This, however, is quite a different matter, and it is the inevitable result of a change from post-payment to payment in advance. Unless, of course, a whole year's taxes had been remitted altogether. The Legislature has, however, adopted the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by which nine months' taxes—viz., those on articles kept between the 6th of April, 1869, and the 1st of January, 1870, were remitted altogether, but no others. Present payers of assessed taxes will have the benefit of this remission or intermission of assessed taxes eventually in the manner which we fully explained to our readers some weeks ago. In the meantime they have only to pay eight quarters of the tax within a period of seven quarters—viz., from the 5th April, 1869, to the 31st December, 1870, instead of eight quarters within four quarters of a year, as they would have had to do if a simple change from post payment to payment in advance had been made. As we have said before, we think the scheme, though difficult to understand, is really a very skilful one, and well designed to effect a great benefit, not without any additional pressure upon the tax-payer, but with as little as possible. After all, the question the tax-payers ought to consider is not so much whether they are not put under greater pressure this year than usual by having to make all at once payments which they must have made, under the old system, at considerable intervals of time, but rather whether this pressure is not amply repaid by the heavy debt in respect of the Abyssinian war being cleared off not only without the imposition of fresh taxes, but while other taxes are actually being remitted.

THE BANKRUPTCY RULES.

No. I.

The General Rules and Forms under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, were issued a few days ago—not an hour too soon. Some dissatisfaction has indeed been felt and expressed at the publication of these rules having been so long delayed, seeing that the system, a great part of which can be learned only from the rules, was actually to come into operation on the very day that these rules appeared. But it must be remembered that the very same fact which made these rules so important—namely, the vast number of questions left by the Act to be dealt with in the rules—made the task of preparing them proportionately laborious and responsible; and there were at the utmost but a very few months for the purpose; so that it would probably have been scarcely possible to have had all ready in much better time.

We have already pointed out that the Bankruptcy Act left it to the framers of the rules to decide to a great extent what the law of bankruptcy should be, to a still greater extent in what mode it should be administered, and an almost unfettered discretion as to the persons by whom it should be administered. The rules, as issued, deal with several subjects in the reverse order to that in which we have placed them.

As to the persons by whom the law is to be administered, it will be remembered that the Legislature, pressed, we suppose, by the difficulty of deciding the question, took the simple plan of referring it to the Lord Chancellor and to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy; and, therefore, section 67 of the Bankruptcy Act enacted that "the chief judge, and every judge of a local court, may, subject, and in accordance with the rules of court for the time being in force, delegate to the registrar, or to any other officer of his court, such of the powers vested in him by this Act as it may seem expedient for the judge to delegate to him." The Lord Chancellor and the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, equally cautious with the Legislature, have simply declined to decide the question, and remitted it to every judge in bankruptcy to settle for himself. Rules 2, 3, and 4 are to the effect that any judge may delegate to a registrar any power given by the Act, except that of committing for contempt; the order of a registrar is to have the same force, and be subject to the same appeal as that of a judge; and the registrar may if he please refer any question to the judge. Those who framed the rules have therefore, in the most formal way, decided that, with the exception we have mentioned, the whole of the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the county courts may properly be delegated to the registrars of the court, and no one can complain of the judges of those courts if they do what most of them we are quite sure will do, that is, hand over the whole of their bankruptcy business to the registrars, and never interfere themselves except when the registrar thinks fit to reserve a point for them, or somebody has to be committed for contempt. The registrars in this case will have full power to decide the most complicated and difficult questions, both of law and of fact, and this without any limit of jurisdiction in point of amount. Now, we are far from saying that the registrars are not perfectly competent to decide such questions, though it seems to us somewhat hard upon them that they should be called upon to do so. But it must be observed that these are the same men who in ordinary common law actions, actions for butchers' and bakers' bills and the like, are not allowed to determine the pettiest disputed question, and whose competence to deal even with undefended cases was only found out by the Legislature less than three years ago. Can the spirit of paradox which pervades all county court legislation be more strikingly illustrated?

Such of the rules as relate to the forms and manner of procedure generally call for little remark. The really important rules are those which deal in detail with the various stages of a bankruptcy, and thus, in fact, make the law upon the subject.

We commence with the act of bankruptcy; the only thing as to which the rules seem to us at present to call for comment is the debtor's summons. To any one who read the Act carefully, it must have been pretty plain that the section which dealt with this (section 7) was one of the most important, as well as one of the worst framed of the whole Act. Rules 17 to 25, 41, and a few others, deal with the matter. Rule 41 makes the very necessary provision, that a man shall not be adjudicated bankrupt on the ground of not having paid or secured or compounded the sum claimed by a debtor's summons pending the trial of the question raised on the summons or after its dismissal; a precaution which in the Act itself it was not thought necessary to take. Another rule of extreme importance is Rule 25; but it is unfortunately not very happily worded. The Act says that after service of a debtor's summons the debtor may apply to set it aside, and, according to circumstances, the summons may be at once set aside; or, upon security for the debt being given, proceedings may be stayed to enable the questions raised to be tried. Rule 25 says that, where the proceedings are so stayed, the creditor must take proceedings for recovery of the amount claimed, and prosecute them without delay. Otherwise the summons must be dismissed with costs, but it does not say that the security shall be avoided. It seems pretty clear, however, that the security is intended to be in the form which stands No. 19 in the schedule, a given condition to pay not the sum claimed, but such sum as shall be recovered in proceedings taken within the proper time. This rule undoubtedly works a great improvement upon the section of the Act as to debtors' summonses. But the whole scheme is, we think, a very ill-conceived one; it provides for a debtor summons first and judgment after. It would have been much better to reverse the order, and require every summons to be founded on a judgment. The debtor's summons will probably in practice be used solely as a very favourable mode to the plaintiff of commencing an action at law. Hitherto the defendant has in some cases been entitled to obtain security for costs. For the future plaintiffs may commence proceedings by obtaining from defendant security for debt and costs.

The next steps, the rules as to which are of great importance, are the petition and adjudication. We are very sorry to see that in the form of adjudication given in the schedule the framers have not ventured to require, as we hoped they would have done, that the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy, the date to which title and everything else is to relate back, should appear upon the face of the adjudication. Such a requirement would have been of infinite service, but perhaps there was a danger that it might be thought ultra vires. The petition is to report the actual fact on which it is based, and is to be supported by affidavit; and the debtor may give notice of his intention to dispute any specific fact alleged. At the hearing of the petition, the disputed questions of fact are to be tried by evidence, which may be voir dire, or by affidavit. The hearing may, like other proceedings, be in chambers (Rule 5); and, as we have already pointed out, may be before the registrar.

The rules relating to proceedings subsequent to adjudication, we shall consider hereafter.

We must not, however, conclude these remarks without noticing that a decision by the Chief Judge has already been given upon the construction of two of these rules—viz. Rules 316 and 317. Section 20 of the Bankruptcy Repeal Act, 1869, provides that the repeal shall not interfere with any legal proceeding pending in bankruptcy or otherwise before the commencement of the Act, under any enactment thereby repealed. Rule 316 enacts that the Chief Judge shall have all the powers of the old bankruptcy courts and judges, as to any composition deed executed by a debtor, whether registered or in course of registration, on or before December 31st, 1869, in the same manner as he may, under section 20 of the Bankruptcy Repeal Act, 1869, deal with any other proceedings pending under any of the repealed enactments. In the case to which we allude (and which is reported in another column) a composition-deed executed by the debtor on December 30, 1869, was presented for registration on January 3, 1870. The registrar refused it, but the Chief Judge held that rule 316 enabled him to direct its registration. This decision will probably prove of considerable importance in the face of the recent hurry and rush to complete composition-deeds.

THE CONFUSION OF GOODS.

It has been said that the special dependence of our legal system on decided cases is attended by this disadvantage, that those branches of jurisprudence only, concerning which questions frequently arise in practice, can be reduced to a scientific system. The distinction is scarcely a very reliable one, since, whether the law of a State be judge-made or code-made, only those subjects which recur with some frequency will get drawn between the wheels of the legislative machinery. When, therefore, it is found that subjects which have been strictly dealt with by the codes of ancient and foreign polities are untouched by our own legal system, it is, at least, unsafe to jump to the conclusion that the weakness of our own system is thereby exposed. In some instances such silence is capable of the simple explanation, that in an altered state of society a particular class of questions does not arise. We do not, however, now propose to discuss the advantages and disadvantages in this respect of codes of law such as the Roman or French, but to notice, shortly, one class of cases upon which the civil law has been ample in its precision and our own very scanty; cases, too, which are certainly as likely to happen to merchants of modern Britain as to those of ancient Italy. We mean cases on the intermixture or confusion of goods. Where a question on this subject arises, our courts, finding little to assist them in the reports, are glad to turn to those foreign systems, more fortunate in this instance than our own, which possess scientific codes; and adopting from these codes just so much, considered not inconsistent with English principles, as is sufficient to meet the present demand, they give us one instalment of the law upon a rather complicated inquiry.

The subject, indeed, is one which is almost certain to occur to the mind of a jurist endeavouring to meet in a code all the conceivable conditions which may be imposed upon property; but the dearth of cases bearing on the question in our reports has led to a neglect of the matter in most English legal treatises. Several cases, however, occurring within the last few years show that as a practical branch of legal knowledge the confusion of goods cannot be neglected, and as a matter of theoretical jurisprudence it may, at any rate, be considered a good illustration of the characteristic subtlety of Roman law, and of the modification, which that law undergoes when brought into contact with English principles.

For the sake of perspicuity it may be well to suppose two persons only to be interested in the mixture, the rules requiring only a slight variation where the number is greater.

The term, "confusion of goods," is in English law applied to all cases in which the moveable property of one person has become indistinguishably mixed with the moveable property of another. Where the ingredients are distinguishable, a different question arises, determinable, when they cannot both be considered as principals, by the law of principal and accessory, which subject, though akin to this, should be kept distinct from it. Cases of confusion may be divided into classes distinguished either by the circumstances under which the mixing took place, or by the apparent effect of the mixing.

The latter classification has proved peculiarly attractive to a certain habit of thought, and possesses the sham recommendation of apparently appealing to nature herself to determine the rights of property, and it is the one adopted by the Roman law in its division of the subject into cases of commixtio and cases of confusio, according as the substances intermixed were dry or liquid. Where there had been a confusio, it was thought that the particles of each liquid ingredient no longer remained distinct from those of the other, and the owners of the ingredients were held to be tenants in common of the whole in proportion to the respective values of their contributions. A commixtio or intermixture of dry goods on the other hand did not interfere with either owner's rights of property over the specific substance he had contributed. There was one exception to this latter class, going far to expose the weakness of the classification—namely, where solids were mingled by the consent of both parties, in which case each was considered as granting to the other a share of his own proprietary rights over his contribution, so that they were tenants in common of the whole (Just. Inst. II, ss. 17, 20). Happily, our own English law threw out this distinction; and, indeed, it would be hard to imagine one more radically Philistine, or more calculated to foster chopped logic paid for by unremunerated suitors.

Upon the commixtio it may be observed that some solids are so minute in size and so similar in appearance, grains of wheat, for example, that it would be quite impracticable to effect an accurate separation of them, and, therefore, under the Roman law, the parties in these cases, although a vindicatio or real action lay by either against the other, were obliged merely to divide the mixture between them, so that the distinction in reality only affected the form of the action to be brought. The French Civil Code, avoiding the over-subtlety of Justinian, has altered the position of the line of demarcation, placing it between intermixtures easily separable, and intermixtures not divisible without great difficulty (Code Civile, II. 573). Bracton (II., 3, 2) (who took much from Justinian) makes the right of separate property depend upon the separable nature of the ingredients, except where the commingling is by consent, abandoning apparently, or misunderstanding, the distinction of the civil law or its commentators between liquids and solids. This distinction is, in fact, not recognised by English law, being not only useless in determining the rights of the persons interested, but false in the philosophy of nature. A deeper acquaintance with chemistry than that possessed in Justinian's days, discovers that the particles of wine and honey which have undergone a mere mechanical mixing, and are, therefore, not chemical compounds, remain as distinct, though in quantities of lesser bulk, as grains of wheat and barley when thrown together in the same corn-bin.

A classification more in accordance with the principles of English law, and based upon the obvious rule that the rights of parties should be determined by their own acts rather than by results for which they are not responsible has already received the sanction of Blackstone, and been faintly sketched by him (2 Comm. 390, 391). The circumstances under which a confusion of the goods of two persons may take place seem naturally to divide themselves into three heads (1) when the intermixture is by consent; (2) when it is by the act of one party only; (3) when it is accidental. Questions under the first head must, of course, be decided by the contract of the parties, in all cases where an express contract exists. Where there is no contract, it seems reasonable to imply from the act of mixing an intention that the parties should be tenants in common. We believe, however, that there is no decision in the reports on this point. Under the second head, when the mixture is by the act of one party only, we have a rule peculiar to the English law, which is remarkable both from the rather startling nature of its principle, and from the fact that it is only illustrated, as far as we know, by two old cases, and one or two other decisions in Lord Eldon's time. The rule referred to is that where one person mixes his property with that of another, under such circumstances as to make it afterwards impossible for that other to ascertain the amount of his own property, the latter is the proprietor of the whole without accounting to the former. Cases of this kind arise either from a fraudulent attempt so to confuse the boundaries of meum and tuum that the mixer may gain an advantage, or from pure wantonness; and the law punishes the iniquity of the one and the folly of the other by giving the whole mixture to the person whose dominion is invaded. The earliest case is Stock v. Stock, Popham, 38, where the plaintiff, in order "to be more sure to have the action passel for him," mixed his own hay with certain hay of the defendant's, whose title to it he seems to have disputed, and the defendant carried off the whole. It was thereupon held by all the Court "clearly the defendant shall not be guilty for any part of the hay." The report goes on to distinguish the case from one of adjunction, where the separate property is distinguishable, and also remarks that if the plaintiff had carried off the defendant's hay to his house and mixed it with his own the defendant could not have seized the mixture, but would have been put to his action. The other old case is Ward v. Eyre, Cro. Jac. 366, in which the plaintiff and defendant were "at play," at some game of chance no doubt, and the plaintiff mixed his heap of money with the defendant's, and the defendant carried off the whole. It was held that the defendant could not be called on to account. Both in the case of the hay in dispute and the money won by gambling it is clear that the person without whose consent the mixture was made could not be certain as to the exact amount of his own property before the mixture; and this apparently is the gist of the matter. In Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. 442, Lord Eldon appears to lay down that where a mixture of this sort has taken place it lies on the mixer to distinguish the different properties, and that if he is unable to do so the whole belongs to the other. It should be stated that the rule in question is not allowed to prejudice the rights of creditors (Ex parte Townsend, 15 Ves. 470).

The third head—when the intermixture takes place by accident—is not we believe illustrated in the reports until Buckley v. Gross, 11 W. R. 464, a case which arose out of the great Tooley-street fire in 1861.* The melted tallow and oil from the warehouses of several persons had flowed into the sewers and thence into the Thames where it was collected and sold to the plaintiff who however was deprived of its possession by the police, and the oil was ultimately sold to the defendant. The plaintiff argued that, since the confusion, the oil no longer belonged to the respective warehousemen, but must be considered as derelict, but Blackburn, J., held that the warehousemen were tenants in common of the mixture. A still more recent case, that of Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Company, 16 W. R. 1010, decides that where bales of cotton insured by the plaintiff were shipwrecked, and their marks, together with those of bales of other persons, obliterated, so that the plaintiff's bales could not be distinguished, he was not entitled to recover as for a total loss, he being considered as a tenant in common with the other shippers of all the bales of cotton, the marks of which were obliterated, in the proportion which the number of bales originally shipped by him bore to the whole number on board. This case, which lays down the law that an accidental confusion of goods makes the contributors tenants in common of the whole in the proportion of their original shares, must now be considered the leading case upon the whole subject.

* In Jones v. Moore, 4 Y. & C. 351, oil leaked from the casks of various owners had been pumped up in one indistinguishable bulk; but here the owners had agreed to share the mass as tenants in common in proportion to their respective losses.

RECENT DECISIONS.

COMMON LAW.

DISSOLUTION OF CONTRACT BY DEATH—MASTER AND SERVANT.

Farrolo v. Wilson, O.P., 18 W. R. 43.

The short point decided in this case is that the contract of service between a master and servant is put an end to by the death of the master. The general rule on the subject is laid down in the judgment of the Court—viz., "that the death of either party puts an end to such contract for personal service unless there is a stipulation express or implied to the contrary."

The principle of the decision is not new, but has been frequently recognised before, as for instance, in Beast v. Kirth (17 W. R. 29), where a covenant of service in an apprenticeship deed was held subject to the implied condition that the apprentice should be in a state of ability to perform the covenant, and it was decided that the illness of the apprentice was an answer to an action on the covenant. To the same effect also are the cases Taylor v. Caldwell (11 W. R. 726), and Tascher v. Shepherd (9 W. R. 476).

The precise point in question in Farrolo v. Wilson seems, however, not to have been before decided.

Astley v. Gurney, Ex.Ch., 18 W. R. 44.

It has long been established by statute that where there are "mutual credits or mutual debts" between a bankrupt and another person, one debt or demand may be set off against another. That is, one who is both debtor of a bankrupt and has also claims upon the bankrupt is not obliged to pay his debt in full, and then prove for the amount of the bankrupt's debt to him, but may set off one demand against the other, and prove for or pay the balance alone. This right was first given long ago, but it now depends upon section 171 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849.

As may be easily imagined, it is often difficult to say what dealings between a bankrupt and another person come within the terms "mutual credits" or "mutual debts." Two modern cases show very clearly the principle which guides the Courts in the construction of section 171.

In Young v. The Bank of Bengal (1 Moo. P. C. 150) securities were given to the defendants, creditors of the bankrupt, with power to sell them if default were made by the bankrupt in paying a debt. It is clear that on this state of facts a debt might or might not be the result of the dealings. Default was not made in payment of the debt, and the Court held that there was no mutual credit, as it was not contemplated that a debt should arise in the ordinary course, but, on the contrary, that the original debt should be paid, and that the securities should be returned.

In Naoroji v. The Chartered Bank of India (16 W. R. 791) the defendants, creditors of the bankrupt, had received from the bankrupt bills for collection. This was held to be a case of mutual credit, because although the authority to collect the bills given to the defendants might have been revoked, yet, as it was not revoked, and as the transaction primarily contemplated a collection of the bills, the direct object of the dealing was to create a debt from the defendants to the bankrupt. It will be seen that there is no conflict of principle between these two decisions.

In Astley v. Gurney the defendants, creditors of the bankrupts, accepted bills for the bankrupts, and received from them certain coffee and cotton, as security in case the bankrupts should fail to provide funds for the payment of the acceptances. Subsequently the bankrupts gave the defendants a power to sell the coffee and cotton.

The cotton was sold under this power, and realised sufficient to pay the acceptances. The bankruptcy then occurred, and afterwards the defendants sold the coffee, and claimed to retain the proceeds of this sale against the original debt due from the bankrupts.

It was clear that the original transaction did not amount to a mutual credit, and also that the dealing with the cotton under the circumstances that occurred did come within section 171. The substantial question was as to the proceeds of the coffee, and this depended upon the effect of the power of sale given by the bankrupts. If it was a mere direction to sell, and revocable after the acceptances had been provided for, and if the bankrupts retained the right to the property on paying the acceptances, it would not have been a case of mutual credit, as then it would fall within the principle of Young v. The Bank of Bengal. If, however, the power was irrevocable, and the bankrupts gave up all right to have back their property, there would be a mutual credit under the principle of Naoroji v. The Bank of Bengal. The majority of the Court, Kelly, C.B., dissenting, held, approving the decision in Naoroji v. The Chartered Bank of India, that the latter was the true construction of the arrangement, and that the dealing with the coffee was a case of mutual credit.

This decision turned rather on special facts than upon any disputed principle of law, but we notice it, because it illustrates very well the kind of question that has frequently arisen under section 171, and because the approval by the Court of Naoroji v. The Chartered Bank of India gives to that case the authority of a decision of the Exchequer Chamber.

We also notice this case for the purpose of drawing attention to one of the many alterations that the new Bankruptcy Act that came into operation on the 1st of January has introduced into the law of bankruptcy.

The new statute repeals the Bankruptcy Acts at present in force, and with them section 171 of the Act of 1849, concerning mutual credits and mutual debts. The provisions of section 171 are re-enacted in section 39 of the new statute, with an important addition—section 39 gives a right to set-off “when there have been mutual credits, mutual debts, or other mutual dealings, between the bankrupt and any other person” proving under the bankruptcy. The words “or other mutual dealings” are new. They are not in section 171, and it would seem that they have been added for the purpose of meeting cases like Astley v. Gurney, where there are, in fact, mutual dealings, but not necessarily mutual credits or mutual debts. Most of the decisions on the mutual credit clauses of the Bankruptcy Act will, therefore, be of no value in construing the corresponding section in the new statute.

LIABILITY OF A HUSBAND ON HIS WIFE'S CONTRACTS—NECESSARIES.

Richardson v. Dubois, Q.B., 18 W. R. 62.

Great confusion of thought is often observable in discussions as to the liability of a husband on his wife's contracts, and we believe it might be said, without exaggeration, that this is chiefly caused by the use of inaccurate phraseology.

It is commonly laid down, and the dictum is found in judgments, that a wife has an implied authority to bind her husband by a contract for necessities. This is a misleading proposition, unless carefully explained and limited.

A married woman can either bind her husband by contracts authorised by him, or by contracts for necessities. Her power as an agent to contract is like that of any other agent, limited by her authority. She has neither more nor less power than any other agent whom her husband might employ to make contracts for him. The rules of law by which a man may be bound by his wife's contracts as his agent are not in any way peculiar to the relation of husband and wife, but depend solely upon the general law of principal and agent. The fact of marriage does not per se make the wife the agent of the husband, although in some cases there is a presumption during cohabitation that the wife has authority to contract, as explained in Jolly v. Rees (12 W. R. 478) and Harrison v. Grady (14 W. R. 139). This presumption, however, may be rebutted. Subject to this presumption, a wife's authority must be proved as that of any other agent. It is clear that in these cases no question can properly arise as to whether the contracts are or are not for necessities. If she was authorised to contract, the contract is that of the husband, who is therefore bound. If she was not authorised he is not bound, as it is not his contract.

A husband is also liable for contracts made by his wife for necessities. It almost follows as a matter of course, from the use of the word “necessaries,” that if the wife is fully supplied with all she is entitled to, she cannot bind her husband by any contract for necessities (except as agent), because she is not in want of anything that is necessary. This right to bind her husband is sometimes, and indeed generally, treated as a sort of authority implied by law, which the husband cannot revoke. It would, however, be more accurate to treat it as a consequence of the husband's legal duty to provide his wife with necessities. If he fails to do so, and they are supplied by a third person, such third person is entitled to treat the transaction as if made with the husband, and the necessities supplied to him, and therefore to recover payment from him. A husband cannot deprive his wife of this right to be supplied with necessities. He may supply them himself, but if he fails to do so he is liable to pay any person who does supply them.

In Richardson v. Dubois the plaintiff did certain repairs in a house for the wife of the defendant, who was a lunatic. The wife was sufficiently supplied with money for all necessary purposes, including the making of the repairs in question, which were necessary repairs. It was of course held that the plaintiff could not recover. The wife had no authority in fact from her husband, who, being a lunatic, could not contract, and as she was already supplied with all necessities her husband could not be liable for any contracts not authorised by him. It is somewhat surprising that the case should have been argued at all, but there is no doubt that the obscurity which too often prevails in the judicial enunciation of the principles applicable to these cases necessarily tends to create litigation. Careless expressions and ill-considered dicta frequently give an appearance of authority to an argument which is not at all supported by the decisions from which such expressions and dicta are gathered.

ADMIRALTY.

RIGHT OF ACTION—CONSIGNEE NAMED IN BILL OF LADING—PASSING OF PROPERTY.

The Nepoter, 18 W. R. 49.

Before the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), the indorsee of a bill of lading could not maintain any action for breach of the terms of the bill of lading, because the contract was not made with him and could not be assigned to him. This was so even when the whole property in the goods comprised in the bill of lading vested in the indorsee by a sale of the goods, and when no one but the indorsee was injured by the breach of the bill of lading. Such an indorsee might sue in trover if the goods were improperly withheld, or in any other action depending on the right of property alone, because he had the full right of property in the goods, but he could not sue on the contract contained in the bill of lading.

18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, gives to consignees named in bills of lading and to indorsees “to whom the proerty in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or indorsement" the same rights and liabilities as if the contract had been made with themselves. In other words this statute rendered bills of lading negotiable instruments which can now be transferred at will by indorsement.

The Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 6), gives the Admiralty Court jurisdiction over "any claim by the owner, or consignee, or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods," &c., &c.

The question in the Nepoter was whether consignees, mentioned in a bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods had not passed, could sue under section 6 of the Admiralty Court Act. This point had arisen before and been decided by Dr. Lushington in the St. Cloud (Bl. & Lush. 16) who held that "any claim" mentioned in section 6 means "any claim existing independently of this Act" and as an assignee could have no right of action on the bill of lading except under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, and as that statute does not apply where no property passes to the indorsee, therefore a lien indorsee, to whom no property passed, could not maintain a suit under section 6 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861.

Sir R. Phillimore refused to follow this decision, and held that a nudo assignee might maintain a suit under section 6 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, on the ground that there was nothing to show that the provisions of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111—viz., that the property in the goods must pass to the indorsee to give him a right of action, was imported into the Admiralty Court Act, 1861. On this view of the law it was not necessary to decide whether the plaintiffs in this case had any property in the goods; but Sir R. Phillimore expressed an opinion, on the evidence, that sufficient property had passed to them to satisfy 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111.

The case also decided a question on the construction of the bill of lading, which was for casks of sugar, and provided that the defendants should be "not liable for leakage." During the voyage some barrels of sugar leaked, and the sugar that so escaped accumulated, through the negligence of the master, about the plaintiffs' casks, for which the bill of lading was given, and caused the plaintiffs' sugar to heat.

It was held that this was not an injury by "leakage" within the meaning of the memorandum of the bill of lading, and that the defendants were, therefore, liable for the damage which was caused by the negligence of the master.

This decision follows the well-known rule that the proximate cause of damage must be looked to and not the ultimate cause. The immediate and proximate cause of this damage was the accumulation of the drainage of sugar about the plaintiffs' casks, and not leakage which was a remote, and need not have been a necessary cause of the damage.

There was no difficulty about the last point, but the question as to the construction of section 6 of Admiralty Court Act, 1861, is much more important. The meaning of that section is now doubtful in consequence of the conflict between the St. Cloud and the Nepoter, and must so remain until there is further judicial decision on the point.

COUNTY COURTS ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION ACT, 1868, ss. 3, 9—COSTS.

The Young James, Adm., 18 W. R. 52.

We have had occasion more than once to point out the careless way in which the County Courts Admiralty Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), has been drawn. It contains even more than the average number of blunders which may be expected in an English statute. Of course the result of this carelessness is expensive litigation, which care and attention might have rendered unnecessary. The Young James is one of the first cases under this statute, and arose upon the 3rd and 9th sections, which regulate the right to costs. Section 3 gives jurisdiction to county courts in, amongst others, "any claim for damage by collision in which the amount claimed does not exceed £300." Section 9 enacts that a plaintiff in the Admiralty Court recovering there less than £300 in a case over which a county court had jurisdiction, "shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge before whom the cause is tried or heard shall certify," &c.

The plaintiff in this case claimed, in a suit in the Admiralty Court, £1,000. The plaintiff had suffered, in fact, damage to about that amount in consequence of a collision between his and the defendant's vessel. The defendant paid into court £252, and alleged that his liability was limited to this amount by section 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, which restricts the amount of damages payable by shipowners for injuries done by their vessels to other vessels to £8 for each ton of the wrong-doing ship's tonnage, unless there has been personal negligence on the part of the owners.

The plaintiff accepted the money thus paid into court, which was less than the amount over which county courts have jurisdiction.

It was decided that the plaintiff was entitled to his costs without a certificate, on the ground that he had a substantial bona fide claim for more than £300, and that he was therefore entitled to sue in the Admiralty Court, although the defendant could reduce this claim below £300 if it appeared that the facts brought the defendant within section 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862. Sir R. Phillimore likened the case to one of set-off, where the plaintiff has a claim which could not be enforced in a county court, but which is reduced by the defendant's cross claims to an amount over which a county court has jurisdiction. In such a case it has been decided that the plaintiff is entitled to costs. (Woodhouse v. Newman, 7 C. B. 666).

It was also argued that the judge could not grant a certificate, as the cause had not been "tried or heard" before him, but had been stopped before it reached that stage. The decision rendered it unnecessary to consider this point, upon which Sir R. Phillimore gave no opinion.

This case will be an authority for the practice in the three superior courts, as well as in the Admiralty Court, as section 9 of the County Courts Admiralty Act applies to them as well as to the Court of Admiralty. The direct decision is, that for the purposes of costs, under the County Courts Admiralty Act, 1868, the amount of a claim which may be reduced under section 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, is to be considered irrespective of such possible or probable reduction. The principle of the case, however, goes further than this, for the ratio decidendi is that the words "proceedings which might be taken in a county court" (the words used in section 9) mean proceedings which at the time of their commencement might have been reasonably and properly commenced in a county court. That is, that the ultimate result of the proceedings is not to decide where they should have been commenced, but that the circumstances existing before the commencement may be examined. In other words, that a plaintiff having a bona fide claim for more than £300, although he recovers less than that amount, yet he is entitled to his costs without a certificate.

The principle of this decision gets rid of one of the many serious difficulties in the statute. In the General County Court Acts there has always been a margin left between the amount over which the county court has jurisdiction and the sum which will entitle a successful plaintiff to costs. The county courts have a common law jurisdiction to the amount of £50, and by the last General County Courts Act of 1867, if the plaintiff recovers £10 in an action of tort, or £20 in one of contract, he is entitled to costs. By the County Courts Admiralty Act, 1868, no such margin is allowed. If the plaintiff does "not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the county court is limited," he is not entitled to costs. If the amount finally recovered were the test of the jurisdiction of the county court under section 3, the plaintiff would be deprived of costs if he recovered in the Admiralty Court £299, although he might have had good reason for believing that he was legally entitled to and could recover over £300. The construction now put upon section 3 prevents the possibility of such a ludicrous result.

REVIEWS.

The Commentaries of Gaius on the Roman Law, with an English Translation and Annotations. By FREDERICK TOMKINS, Esq., M.A., D.C.L., and WILLIAM GEORGE LEMON, Esq., LL.B., of Lincoln's Inn, Barristers-at-Law. Part 2, completing the work. London: Butterworths, 7, Fleet Street.

In consequence of the completion of this edition of Gaius by the publication of the second part we have now for the first time that author before us in an English dress and accompanied by explanatory English notes. The want of such an edition has been hitherto much felt by English students, who have had to find their way through the Commentaries of Gaius without those facilities which have been afforded to the readers of Justinian's Institutes. No work in English on the civil law could be more welcome than one which would supply these wants, and we are therefore predisposed to receive favourably such an edition of Gaius as is promised by the title page of Messrs. Tomkins and Lemon's book.

When the first part of the Commentaries appeared we noticed the general plan of the edition, and we expressed our opinion (13 S. J. 499) that the portion then published possessed considerable merit, both in the translation and in the notes, but that the value of the latter was very seriously diminished by a want of systematic arrangement and clearness of expression. There were in addition some minor faults which, although not perhaps seriously affecting the intrinsic merit of the book, at all events lessened its value to those who are not already familiar with the questions discussed in the notes. We mean such errors as the careless and inaccurate employment of technical words, and the statement of legal propositions without the limitations to which they are subject. There were, besides, a most unusual number of misprints and trivial mistakes, the evident consequence of want of care in revision.

What we then said concerning the first part is, to a great extent, true of the second part. We find in this second part an accurate translation (although not entirely free from slips) and notes which display considerable knowledge and industry. These notes might, however, have been rendered much more valuable by a more judicious arrangement of the same materials, but as they now stand some of them are simply useless as explanations. The way in which the subject of Actions is treated shows very well what we mean. The first 138 paragraphs of the fourth book of Gaius deal with this subject. It is obvious that a note at this portion of Gaius might be most useful, if it gave a concise explanation of the nature of and a sketch of the history of actions. Or the authors might have strictly confined themselves to their usual practice of inserting their explanatory notes immediately under the paragraph that seems to require explanation, without venturing upon anything like an independent essay. Each plan would have its advantages—neither plan has been fully adopted. Immediately after the first paragraph there is a note of nineteen pages about actions, but neither the nature nor the history of actions is dealt with in an intelligible manner. The note touches on both subjects, but very insufficiently. We are told that "the claim which a man has to the protection which the state affords to his person and property is denominated his right of action." This is a bad definition of a right of action to start with, and it is followed by a confused statement that a man may always exercise his right, but that this is subject to modifications.

Roman civil process is then divided into two periods, separated by the reign of Diocletian, but not a hint is given as to the change introduced about the time of Diocletian, which is the cause why this division into two periods has been adopted. So also there is no explanation of the meaning of "legis actiones" or of "formulae," each of which is incidentally noticed once only. The different steps in the process of an action are thus given: "The first part of the process until the sentence was divided into two principle parts: first, the Instruction, and second the Proof." This is not a very intelligible description, and it is not made much clearer by what follows. There is a great deal in the note about the "prætor," "judices," "centumviri," "recuperatores," "arbitri," and other officers, but that which is above all needful in this part of Gaius, viz., a clear and concise description of the ordinary course of Roman civil process, and of one or two of the chief changes which had taken place at different epochs, is not to be found. The last three pages of this note are very characteristically devoted to a discussion of the Roman calendar, a subject admittedly obscure, and here very much out of place. In short, it is not too much to say that no person unacquainted with the subject would derive any benefit from reading the confused mass of information which constitutes this note.

We have purposely selected the subject of actions for examination because it is the most important one treated of in this second part of Gaius, and because it is discussed at considerable length in the notes. The omissions which we have noticed are not caused by any want of knowledge on the part of the editors. The points omitted in one place are generally found somewhere else, but in no one place have we found any subject of importance clearly and sufficiently discussed. The information given in one note has generally to be supplemented from other notes on other subjects. Formulae, for instance, and the different divisions of the formula are mentioned in the notes before the meaning of the word or the nature of the proceeding is dealt with. So also with the legis actiones, concerning which it is stated (at p. 539) that "the lex Ebutia put an end to the legis actiones," which expression is explained at p. 645 to mean that the legis actiones were not put an end to by that lex, but that the use of them died out gradually, and the lex Ebutia serves only as a landmark in the history of these actions.

All the longer notes have these faults to a greater or less degree, as in the note on interdicts at p. 741 et seq., and on delicts at p. 546 et seq. The note at pp. 529, 530, concerning mandate, is almost a repetition, in somewhat different phrases, of the preceding note at pp. 527, 528. The note at p. 512 is absolutely meaningless in consequence of the careless way in which it is worded.

So far we have had to point out only defects, but in one respect we are glad to notice an improvement on the first part—viz., in the way in which the proofs have been revised. There are on the whole fewer errors of mere carelessness than in the first part, and also there are fewer strange and unknown words, although there still remain some which might be expunged with advantage, such as "talion," "processual," &c.

On the whole, this edition of Gaius is a useful addition to English works on the civil law, and it will be serviceable to many who cannot refer to foreign books on the subject. It is, however, in consequence of the defects we have noticed, by no means a good book for those who do not yet know anything of the civil law. It wants entirely that clearness of exposition which is so necessary for beginners. This evil might be much diminished, if not altogether obviated, by a thorough revision of the materials already collected. It is order, and not matter, that is wanted. If the book should ever reach a second edition we hope that more justice will then be done to the valuable materials already collected.

Sir Thomas Tilson, formerly a solicitor of the City of London has resigned the chairmanship of the Surrey Quarter Sessions, which he has held since 1867. At a recent meeting of the Surrey Bench, the following resolution, proposed by Earl Lovelace, was unanimously adopted:—"That this court has received with deep regret the resignation of Sir Thomas Tilson, Knt., and that the magistrates now present beg to tender their cordial and sincere thanks to him for the able and meritorious manner in which he has conducted the business of the county at the General and Adjoined Sessions, over which he has so long presided—first as deputy, and in later years as principal chairman.

COURTS.

BANKRUPTCY COURTS.

LONDON.

Dec. 31.—This day Mr. Commissioner Winslow, took his seat for the last time, when the following addresses were delivered:—

Mr. Bagley, on behalf of the bar, said Mr. Winslow's zeal and devotion in the discharge of his duties as a registrar, and his intimate knowledge of the law and practice of bankruptcy, had pointed him out as eminently qualified to fill the office of commissioner when a vacancy should occur. And his appointment amply and speedily justified the expectation then entertained. All were convinced that he possessed judicial as well as administrative abilities of a high order. He (Mr. Bagley) would not express on this occasion any opinion as to the wisdom or expediency of the legislative arrangements by which, in the prime of life and with undiminished energies, the public are about to lose the benefit of Mr. Winslow's services. He offered in behalf of the bar the expression of their sincere esteem, and thanks for his uniform kindness and consideration. In all their experience there had been no incident that could be considered disagreeable in the whole of their intercourse. (Applause.)

Mr. Lawrance, on behalf of the solicitors, said he could not conceive a more lamentable waste of great judicial power than the depriving one of the greatest commercial tribunals of this country of Mr. Winslow's judicial talents. He regretted that with administrative faculties fully matured, and at the very height of his energies, Mr. Winslow should, while yet a young man, be required to retire into private life. He dwelt on Mr. Winslow's care and accuracy when registrar, and his strictness, without injustice, as taxing master. Mr. Lawrance concluded as follows:—Sir, I may venture to say, but it is not very much to boast of, that I am the oldest living practitioner in bankruptcy, but I have no recollection (extending now over a series of years), of a court so satisfactorily constituted in all respects, and in all its branches as this has been during the period of your incumbency. What is in the future we know not. We as faithful subjects must do the best we can to give effect to the new statute—we must learn to look at its difficulties manfully, and to do the best we can to surmount them; but I do very sincerely regret as the gravest and greatest of all changes effected by that measure, that it will deprive us of your judicial services, and of those of our esteemed, and I may venture to say our venerable and venerated friend, Mr. Holroyd. (Loud cheers.)

The COMMISSIONER.—Mr. Bagley and Mr. Lawrance, I thank you both very heartily for the kind expressions which you have on your own behalf and on behalf of others made use of towards me. It is now approaching twenty-eight years since I first entered upon the performance of my duties in bankruptcy. It gives me no small satisfaction that at the end of so many years of my public life, my conduct permits being spoken of in the kind manner in which you who are so able to judge of it have expressed yourselves. I feel, however, that if I have in a measure performed my duties satisfactorily, it has been quite as much from the assistance which I have received from those around me—from the members of the bar and from the members of the other profession who have practised before me. I really cannot recall anything unpleasant—any expression, act, or deed, which was unseemly in all our intercourse, and I shall ever look back upon it with satisfaction. It would, indeed, be ungrateful if I were to forget the services of the officers of the court—my colleague the senior Commissioner especially. To him I owe very much. To my two registrars who have been most painstaking and have at the very greatest personal sacrifice assisted me whenever I wished to have the business of the Court dispatched with unusual rapidity. To my official assignee and my messenger and his clerk, and last I would not forget my usher, who has been of much service to me as my secretary and clerk of the court, and who has besides his own duties sometimes been assisting in more courts than one. To all these I owe very much. I thank you again for all you have kindly said about me. I wish you all in the administration of the new law upon which you are about to enter, not only much personal advantage, but I hope you will have the highest gratification which arises from the knowledge that you are assisting in the true real administration of equal justice between creditor and debtor—the like gratification to which it has been impossible to feel in the administration of this present Act of Parliament. With these observations I take my leave and wishing you all much future prosperity and happiness, I thank you once more for your kindness. (Applause.)

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Jan. 6th.—In re A Composition Deed.

A deed executed on December 30, 1869, and tendered for registration on January 3, 1870—directed to be registered.

On the 30th December, 1869, a debtor executed a deed of composition with his creditors, which he completed and tendered for registration on the 3rd of January. He tendered the deed for registration at the proper office, but the application was refused. Thereupon application was made to Mr. Registrar Brougham to direct the registration of the deed, on the ground that, the deed having been executed by the debtor before the statute expired although not completed until afterwards, it constituted pending business over which the court had jurisdiction. The registrar refused the application on the ground that the 317th rule defined the class of deeds within the description of "pending business," but the debtor having obtained leave to mention the matter to the chief judge.

Mr. Reed contended that under the 316th rule the Court could allow registration, and that the 317th rule must only be construed as a declaration, that in cases of deeds where the twenty-eight days had expired and the time had been enlarged, such deeds were within the meaning of Rule 316. Suppose a debtor executed a deed of assignment twenty-six days before the 31st, and the trustees took possession, their rights were vested and the statute could not destroy them.

The CHIEF JUDGE, referring to the 20th section of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83, which prescribed all rights in respect of business commenced before the 31st December, 1869, and having regard to the Rules 316 and 317, which defined the description of business called "pending business," held that the Court had power to direct the registration. His Lordship added that the 317th rule was merely a declaration that the deeds mentioned in it were included in the class of business described as pending.

Order for registration accordingly.
Solicitors, Appleby & Co..

BIRMINGHAM.

Dec. 31.—This being the last day of the sitting of the Court, the barristers and solicitors practising in this Court had drawn up addresses to read to his Honour at the conclusion of the business.

Mr. Motteram, on the part of the bar, testified the regard they entertain for his Honour's character. He commented on the undisturbed temper, the equanimity seldom interrupted, the unwearied patience, the uniform and impartial attention, and the kindness and consideration displayed by his Honour during his judicial career. The termination of their professional connection was regarded by all as a subject of sincere and unfeigned regret. They begged him to accept their cordial and sincere wishes that he might enjoy health and happiness in repose; and hoped that he would sometimes think kindly of those who would ever regard him with affectionate interest, and would long remember the admirable manner in which he at all times combined the courtesy of the gentleman with the learning and ability of the judge. (Applause.)

Mr. Griffin, on the part of the solicitors, said the practice of the bar had been confined almost entirely to public business, whilst the other branch of the profession had, in addition to this, had to conduct the practice in chambers, where so many tedious and technical questions had arisen. On account of his Honour's great personal kindness and consideration to this as well as in the public business, he heartily concurred in the expressions of his learned friend.

His Honour (Mr. Commissioner Sanders) replied as follows:—Gentlemen, I am almost overcome with the kindness of the addresses both of Mr. Motteram, on the part of the bar, and of Mr. Griffin, on the part of the solicitors. I should be unfeeling, indeed, if I did not regard with pride and pleasure the tokens you have given of the appreciation of my poor services during the eleven years that I have had the honour of a seat on this Bench. I believe that on the whole the business of this Court has been conducted with effectiveness and regularity, but I am far from attributing or arrogating to myself the merit of having been to a great extent the cause of it. The duty of a judge is to act with justice and impartiality to all, and that duty I have, to the best of my ability, endeavoured to fulfil. But the practitioners in a court have it in their power to facilitate or to impede materially the business of the Court. I am happy to say,—and I consider myself most fortunate in being able to say,—that I have been assisted skilfully and effectually by all those whom I have had the pleasure of seeing practising before me. The spirit of courtesy which has existed between us all has, no doubt, much softened the difficulties of our respective labours. My career here is at an end, and I deeply regret that I must part with you. I shall ever remember with satisfaction the period in which I was in association with you. In bidding you now farewell, I wish you a happy new year, and as much success as it is possible for you to attain under the altered circumstances of your positions. Whether the alteration will bring with it success or not to all or many of you it is impossible for me to guess; but I sincerely hope, and do indeed trust, that you will none of you suffer from the change, but that, on the contrary, the success you have achieved in your old career will follow you persistently in your new. Once more farewell.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. THOMAS MALLAM, solicitor, of Oxford, has been appointed Clerk to the Magistrates of that city, in the room of the late Mr. Henry Jacob, deceased. Mr. T. Mallam is the senior member of the firm of Messrs. T. & G. Mallam, of High-street, Oxford.

Mr. A. H. HUNT, Solicitor, of Romford, Essex, has been elected Clerk to the Guardians of the Orsett Union, in the place of Mr. North Surridge, solicitor, who has resigned. Mr. Hunt has been for a few years in partnership with Mr. Surridge, and fills the office of vestry clerk of Romford.

Mr. FREDERICK JAMES CHESTER, solicitor, of Newington Butts, Surrey, has been appointed Clerk to the Newington Vestry, in the place of his late brother, Mr. Henry Chester, who met his death by a fall in the Alps a few months ago.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

. We shall be happy to print bankruptcy decisions of importance, from the county courts, with which practitioners may favour us.

The unusual length of the list of bankruptcies and the necessity of printing the scale of fees and costs just published, obliges us to postpone several other letters.

If M. W. will comply with our requirements by sending us (not necessarily for publication) his name and address, we will print an answer to his letter.

JURISDICTION OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—The fourth question put forth by the Judicature Commission is as follows:—

"Ought the enactments giving power to the superior courts to send cases to the county courts, to be amended, by allowing an order for that purpose to be made at any time after the issuing of the writ on the application of either party?"

The form of the above query furnishes the best internal evidence that the learned Commissioners have had their attention only partially directed to the evils arising from the existing legislation; and I shall, therefore, probably do some little service, if I point out in this letter a few of the principal anomalies connected with the subject. The enactments in question are four, three of which relate to actions at common law, and one to suits in equity. I will first contrast the two, which are respectively embodied in section 26 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, and section 7 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. Both these sections are confined to actions of contract, where the debt or balance claimed does not exceed £50, and both confer power on any superior judge to send such actions to the county court for trial. But here all similarity ceases between the two enactments; for, while by the one the judge can act "on the application of either party," by the other he has no power to interfere except at the instance of the defendant. Under the former section the application cannot be made until "after issue joined," under the latter it must be made, if at all, "within eight days" from the service of the writ. Again, by the first Act, the cause may be sent to any county court, and the judge may impose "such terms as he shall think fit," but by the second the proceedings must be transmitted to the special county court "in which the action might have been commenced," and the judge has no authority to impose any terms whatever. Under the Act of 1856 the order and issue, without the writ, are sent to the registrar of the county court, and, after the trial has taken place, a certificate of the result is remitted to the superior court, which alone is empowered to sign judgment. Under the Act of 1867 the order with the writ must be lodged with the registrar, and the cause is thenceforth retained by the local tribunal, and dealt with as an original county court plaint.

Doubtless these incongruities, when placed in juxtaposition, will appear sufficiently remarkable, but, in fact, they are less striking than what I am about to point out. They at least became law at different periods, there being an interval of eleven years between the two statutes. But the contrasts to which I now call attention will be found in one and the same Act, and in all but consecutive sections. We have seen that section 7 of the Act of 1867 is confined to actions of contract for £50 or under, but section 10 of the same Act applies to actions of tort for any amount, however large. By the former section the defendant must apply for the removal of the cause within eight days after the writ has been served upon him, but by the latter the time for the application is as unlimited as the amount of the claim. In the one case the order may be made "by any judge at chambers," in the other it must be made "by a judge of the court in which the action is brought." By section 7 the county court selected must be that in which the action might have been commenced; by section 10 any county court may be ordered to try the cause. So long as the action be one of contract the judge may remove it to the county court at the mere instance of the defendant; but if it be an action of tort, he has no power to act unless the plaintiff fail to give security for costs, or to satisfy him that the case is "fit to be prosecuted in the superior court."

Then comes section 8 of the same Act, which relates to the transfer of equity suits from the Court of Chancery to the county court, and which has no family resemblance to either of the sections just referred to. The amount in dispute is not limited to £50, as in section 7, nor is it unlimited as in section 10, but the power to remove is made dependent on the fact that the property claimed does not exceed £500. Unlike section 7, this clause enacts, that the application must be made "to the judge to whose court the suit shall be attached," and unlike section 10, the county court in which the suit might have been brought, can alone be selected, and the plaintiff has no power to stay the transfer by giving security for costs, or by any other act. Again, unlike both sections, the application is not confined to defendants, but, as in the Act of 1856, may be made "by any of the parties," and unlike all the sections already noticed, the order may be made, if the judge thinks fit, without any application from either party, and in direct opposition to the wishes of both.

It is not difficult to perceive that enactments thus varied and inconsistent, though appearing in the same statute, must be the work of different hands, and of hands too, which have obviously acted on the maxim, better adapted to charity than to legislation, of not letting the left hand know what the right hand doeth. To attempt to reconcile the irreconcilable is a waste of energy, and the only sensible mode of dealing with these sections is to repeal them. A single enactment may then be framed applicable to all causes, which it may be thought desirable to remove from a superior court to a county court. I have no desire to poach on the manor of Mr. Thring, and to arrogate to myself the functions of a government draftsman, but I may be permitted to suggest, that the law should be drawn in such a form as to enable any party to any cause, involving any amount, which is brought in any superior court, whether of common law, equitable, or maritime jurisdiction, and with which the county court might originally have dealt had the sum in dispute been less, to apply at any time after the commencement of the action or suit, and on any reasonable grounds, to any judge having jurisdiction in respect of causes of a like nature, for the removal of the proceedings; and such judge should be empowered, in exercise of his discretion, either to send the case to any county court, with or without imposing any terms on the applicant, or to retain the case in the superior court with or without imposing any terms on the opposite party. In short, the greatest latitude should be afforded to the judge to deal with each case brought under his notice in the manner most conducive to the interests of the parties, and the furtherance of justice; and the only stipulation which I consider necessary to be made is, that the judge himself should judicially consider the matter, and should not hand it over, as I fancy is now sometimes done, to the master of the court who happens to be sitting in chambers. The inquiry whether a cause should be transmitted to a county court or retained where it is, will often involve a careful balancing of advantages and disadvantages, and this delicate duty ought not to be left to the vicarious discretion of an inferior functionary.

In the event of the alterations here proposed being carried out, or even in the event of the tenth section of the Act of 1867 being allowed to remain in its present unsatisfactory state, it will be almost an act of necessity to empower the county courts to deal originally with cases of malicious prosecution, libel, slander and seduction. For a law which forbids a plaintiff to commence proceedings in a county court in certain forms of action, and which yet permits a defendant to remove these very causes to the same tribunal after they have been commenced in a superior court, is so essentially absurd that it requires only to be pointed out to insure its correction.

I also venture to suggest, as a salutary amendment of the law, and as completing what I have to say on the subject of county court jurisdiction, that all causes which are now sent for trial before the under-sheriff, by virtue of writs of inquiry, should henceforth be transmitted to the county court, to be there disposed of. (See 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, ss. 16, 18.) The sixth section of the Act of 1867 effected an alteration of a similar nature, but being apparently of a tentative character, it did not go far enough.

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION.

Sir,—I beg to inform you that on the 11th inst. a deputation from the Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Newcastle and Bristol Law Societies had an interview with the Lord Chancellor upon the subject of the first Report of the Judicature Commission, and that at such interview the deputation urged upon his Lordship—

1. That it is desirable the Government should introduce bills in the ensuing session to carry out the recommendations in the first Report of the Judicature Commission.

2. That the Lord Chancellor be pleased to draw the attention of the Commission to the importance of local registries for the supreme court; and

3. That frequent sittings be held in some of the large towns, such as Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Newcastle, and Bristol, for the disposal of business in the supreme court.

I may add that his Lordship graciously received the deputation, and informed the delegates that legislation was intended this session.

Our Society think it important that members of the profession should be informed of this interview. I therefore take the opportunity of requesting the insertion of this note in your next number.

ALBERT T. WRIGHT,
Hon. Sec. Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool.
Liverpool, Dec. 31, 1869.

THE TWO BRANCHES OF THE PROFESSION.

Sir,—I think every solicitor who has the interest of the profession at heart must have welcomed the insertion in your journal of two such able papers as those of Mr. Lowndes, of Liverpool, and Mr. Saunders, of Birmingham, on the union of the two branches of the profession, or what is of greater importance to the public, the expediency of allowing solicitors to plead in the superior courts. In your last impression I have read a letter from "An Advocate" upon the same subject, in which I most cordially agree. Who can deny that in the superior courts we are held to be, as he puts it, a degraded race of mortals, when you yourself, Sir, in a most able article on the American minister's correspondence, wind up with that well accepted proverb, "no case, abuse the attorney?" Let me ask, Sir, for one moment, how came this saying to be a proverb? In this way. A man having dealings in business with another, at last falls out with him, and the other finds it necessary to refer him to his lawyer, who is, of course, an attorney. He goes to the attorney, without employing one himself, and attempts to negotiate with him. He finds the lawyer strictly protects his client's rights, but in a much cooler manner. He cannot understand this coolness, and will not be reasoned with, and immediately goes and instructs another lawyer without further ado to institute proceedings. In the middle of them he is advised that he has a bad case, but he cares not even if he spend every shilling he possesses. He is determined to punish the defendant and show up the attorney. He pays his money accordingly, and the brief is delivered. In it is detailed the various interviews with the attorney, his philosophic reception, his coolness, his indifference, his courage and audacity, his cunning. An irresponsible and ignorant barrister, with no other ability than to air his eloquence, is entrusted with the brief. The case opens thick and hotly upon the attorney, and a semblance of injustice is made out because he is made to appear as an offending party without cause, while his client, against whom the complaint is really made, is scarcely mentioned. What is the result? Notwithstanding all the temper, fire, and eloquence, the case goes against him because they do not touch the real merits; but what about the attorney? The counsel on the other side thinks it so immaterial that he does not think it worth while to vindicate him; but unfortunately the mud has been thrown, and some of it is sure to stick. The abuse, therefore, serves some purpose altogether foreign to the ends of justice, and might in some cases defeat them altogether.

It was some time before the Leeds Committee pressed the subject upon the attention of Mr. Justice Hannen, that I, in an humble effort, brought it before another legal society, but I regret to say with but an indifferent reception. Now, I am happy to say it is better understood and appreciated. No one can deny that the "abuse" we get does tend to degrade us as a class, and as it is totally unwarranted there is no reason why it should prevail. Why, Sir, no one would venture to denounce me or any other solicitor in a court where he can protect himself, and it is high time the gentlemen of the higher (? lower) branch should be taught that those whom they delight to run down are able to defend themselves. The fact of our being permitted to plead under the new Bankruptcy Act before a superior judge admits our competency, and if the profession would only throw away for a moment the false idea that the preparation of a brief pays better than the fee on it, and bring their legitimate influence to bear upon members of Parliament, our proper position in the community would be recognised at once.

A SOLICITOR.

NEWCASTLE BANKRUPTCY COURT.—The Lord Chancellor has authorised Mr. William Sidney Gibson, registrar of the Newcastle Bankruptcy Court, to continue in office for a limited time at Newcastle, in order to dispose of the pending business of the Court. The official assignee, Mr. Laidman, is also to continue, by the Lord Chancellor's desire, to act for a limited time as official assignee in all estates to which he has been already appointed. These arrangements, it is expected, will continue in force for two or three months.

OBITUARY.

MR. HENRY BULLAR.

We have to announce the death of Mr. Henry Bullar, Recorder of Poole, who expired suddenly on the 6th January, at his residence, Basset Wood, near Southampton. The deceased gentleman was the last surviving son of the late John Bullar, Esq., of Basset Wood, by Susannah Sarah, daughter of the late Mr. Whatman. He was born on the 25th February, 1815, was called to the Bar at Lincoln's-inn, in June 1853, and went the Western Circuit, having previously practised for fourteen years as a special pleader. In October, 1864, he was appointed Recorder of Poole and a Judge of the Court of Record in that borough; he was also nominated a Justice of the Peace of the borough and county of Poole. The deceased gentleman was the author of "A Winter in the Azores" and "A Summer at the Baths of Furnas;" he likewise wrote a treatise, entitled "Prators or Pleaders? A letter to the Attorney-General, with Practical Suggestions for the Amendment of Special Pleading."

MR. E. H. T. SNELL.

Mr. Edmund Henry Turner Snell, Barrister-at-Law, died at St. Thome, Madras, on the 28th November last, aged twenty-eight years. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1867, having obtained a certificate of honour at the preceding bar examination. Mr. Snell was the author of "Principles of Equity intended for the use of Students."

MR. T. F. DEARDEN.

Mr. Thomas Ferrand Dearden, Coroner for the county of Lancaster, died at Rochdale on the 2nd January, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. The deceased gentleman was a younger son of the late James Dearden, Esq., Lord of the Manor of Rochdale, by Frances, daughter of the late Thomas Ferrand, Esq., of Thornhill, Yorkshire. His elder brother was the late Mr. James Dearden, F.S.A., a barrister, of Lincoln's-inn. The late Mr. T. F. Dearden began his professional career as a solicitor in 1823, and had filled the office of Coroner for the county of Lancaster since March, 1835, succeeding his uncle, Mr. Thomas Ferrand, who had held the appointment for forty years.

MR. G. F. JACKSON.

The death is reported of Mr. George Frederic Jackson, solicitor, of Plymouth, which took place on the 28th December, at the age of thirty-three years. The late Mr. Jackson took out his certificate as an attorney in Easter Term, 1859, and soon after entered into partnership with Mr. Courtenay Derry. More recently he became a member of the firm of Cleverton & Jackson, which was dissolved not long since.

MR. RUPERT CLARKE.

The Coronership for the county of Berks has become vacant by the death of Mr. Rupert Clarke, solicitor, who expired at Waterloo-lodge, Reading, on the 2nd January, in the sixty-second year of his age. Mr. Clarke was certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1830, and was Coroner for Berks for many years.

MR. R. MOORE.

Mr. Richard Moore, solicitor, of Kirkham, Lancashire, died in London, on the 2nd January, at the age of forty-nine years. The late Mr. Moore was certificated as an attorney in Trinity Term, 1844, and was Clerk to the Magistrates of Kirkham, Registrar of the County Court there, and clerk to the Local Board of Health. According to the Law List, he was the only solicitor practising at Kirkham.

MR. G. F. ABRAHAM.

The death of Mr. George Frederick Abraham, a venerable London solicitor, took place at his residence in Mansfield-street, on the 3rd of January, having attained the advanced age of eighty-eight years. Mr. Abraham was one of the oldest members of the profession in London; his certificate dated as far back as Michaelmas Term, 1805.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

THE SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The usual monthly meeting of the Board of Directors of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association was held at the Law Institution, London, on Wednesday last, the 5th inst., Mr. E. F. Burton in the chair.

The following directors were also present:—Messrs. Benham, Blandy (of Reading), Harrison, Hedger, Monckton, Park Nelson, Rickman, Shaon, Smith, and Torr.—Mr. Eille, secretary.

A donation of £50 was granted to a member of the association in distress, and a sum of £55 was distributed in relief of necessitous widows and families of non-members.

Mr. John Yeomans, Town Clerk of Sheffield, was elected a director of the association, in the room of the late Mr. Francis Hoole of that town.

Fourteen new members were admitted, and other general business transacted.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the society held on the 14th December, 1869, Mr. Hargreaves in the chair, after disposing of several matters of business, the question on the paper for discussion "Is the position of the Home Government with respect to New Zealand conducive to the true interests of the empire?" was opened by Mr. A. G. Harvie. The society, however, adjourned before the question was disposed of. Two gentlemen were elected members, and one resignation was announced. The number of members present was about thirty.

HILARY EDUCATIONAL TERM, 1870.

PROSPECTUS OF THE LECTURES to be delivered, during the ensuing Educational Term, by the several readers appointed by the Inns of Court.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND LEGAL HISTORY.

The Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, six public lectures on the following subjects:—

I.—The common law and statute law applicable to the colonies.

II.—The powers, duties, and liabilities of governors of colonies.

III.—Martial law and courts-martial.

With his private class the Reader will discuss the cases in Broom's Constitutional Law, from "The Banker's Case" to the Case of "The Seven Bishops," inclusive, and will go through the portion of Hallam's Constitutional History referring to the period 1628—1688.

EQUITY.

The Reader on Equity proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, two courses of public lectures (there being six lectures in each course) on the following subjects:—

An Elementary Course.

I.—On the equitable incidents to the relation between principal and surety.

II.—On charitable trusts.

An Advanced Course.

- I.—On relief in equity against accident.
 II.—On implied trusts.
 III.—On the equitable doctrine of conversion.
 In the Elementary Private Class the subjects discussed will be—The Rights and Liabilities of Married Women recognised in a Court of Equity only.

In the Advanced Private Class the lectures will comprehend—The Validity of Voluntary Settlements and Donations Mortis Causa.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY, &c.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property, &c., proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, twelve public lectures (there being six lectures in each course) on the following subjects:—

Elementary Course.

On the mutual rights of husband and wife as to real and personal estate.

Advanced Course.

- I.—On marriage and voluntary settlements (continued from last term's lectures on this subject).
 II.—On the right to fixtures as between different classes of claimants.
 III.—On the force and construction of the covenants and provisions usually introduced in a lease of a dwelling-house for a term.

¶ In the Elementary Private Classes the Reader will continue his course of Real Property Law, using, as a text-book, Mr. Joshua Williams's Principles of the Law of Real Property; and in his Advanced Private Classes he will discuss and explain the principal Real Property Statutes of the present reign.

JURISPRUDENCE, CIVIL AND INTERNATIONAL LAW.

The Reader on Jurisprudence, Civil and International Law proposes to deliver, during the ensuing educational term, six public lectures on the following subjects:—

- I.—The Roman law of property considered historically and systematically.
 II.—The comparison of the Roman and French law respecting the transfer of property, with the English law upon the same subject.
 III.—The right of search.

In his private class the Reader will continue the consideration of the Roman law of contract, commencing with the contract of locatio, and compare it with the English and French law.

The text-books will be Sandars' edition of Justinian, the Code Napoléon, and Addison on Contracts, by Cave.

The Reader in his private class will also continue the discussion of points of international law relating to "The International Rights of States in their Hostile Relations," using the work of Wheaton as the text-book, and referring to the works of the principal modern jurists, the decisions of the Admiralty and Prize Courts of England and America, the debates in Parliament, and State Papers relating to the cases under discussion.

COMMON LAW.

The Reader on Common Law proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, two courses (of six public lectures each) on the following subjects:—

- Elementary Course.*
 I.—Simple contracts—express and implied.
 II.—Wrongs to absolute rights.
 III.—Wrongs to relative rights.

In treating of the above subjects the jurisdiction of the county court, as well as of the superior courts, will be noticed; and the rules of evidence appropriate, and method of proving facts and documents will be explained.

Advanced Course.

- I.—Mercantile contracts, and in connection therewith the relation of principal and agent.
 II.—The contract of bailment, and torts done to chattels under bailment.
 III.—Proofs admissible and the measure of damages to be applied in the actions noticed.

With his private classes the Reader will consider in detail the subjects supra, exemplify them by cases, and explain them by references to the following books:—

Elementary class.—Commentaries by Broom and Hadley, vol. 3; Roscoe on Evidence at Nisi Prius (last edition).
 Advanced Class.—Smith's Leading Cases (last edition), and the books above mentioned.

The Reader on Hindu, Mahomedan, and Indian law proposes to deliver during the ensuing Educational Term a course of six public lectures on the following subjects:—

MAHOMMEDAN LAW.

- I.—Introductory (Saturday, 15th January).
 II.—Inheritance.
 III.—Contracts—
 Sale, hiring, debts, and securities.
 IV.—Gifts.
 V.—Bequests or wills.
 VI.—Marriage—
 Dower, Divorce.

With his private classes the Reader will discuss minutely and in detail the subjects embraced in the public lectures.

On dividend two per cent. on the first amount of £1,000 or any less sum actually divided, and one per cent. on all further sums.

TABLE C.

The fees and allowances payable on proceedings had after the 31st day of December, 1869, in respect of any matter which was pending in any court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy on the said day shall be the same as if those proceedings had been taken before such day, and shall be applied to the same purposes.

We, the undersigned Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, do hereby sanction the foregoing scale of fees, and do direct that the fees to be taken by stamps shall be those mentioned in Table A., and that the fees mentioned in Table B. shall be taken in money, and that the fees and allowances referred to in Table C. shall be taken by stamps or money according as they have hitherto been taken.

And we further direct that the stamp shall be affixed or the money paid in respect of every fee before the proceeding is had in respect of which the fee is payable, and that the charge to be made by the London Gazette for the insertion of each notice authorized by the Act or rules shall be three shillings.

LANSDOWNE.

W. H. GLADSTONE.

1st. January, 1870.

I, the Right Honourable William Page, Baron Hatherley, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, do, by virtue of the powers vested in me by "The Bankruptcy Act, 1869," and of every other power vested in me, hereby order that all proceedings in, and business of the bankruptcies, and all other matters which were pending in the Old London Bankruptcy Court on the 31st day of December, 1869, shall be transferred to the New London Bankruptcy Court.

And I do further order, that the Chief Registrar, Registrars, Accountant in Bankruptcy, Taxing Masters, Official Assignees, and all other Officers holding offices or employed in the Old London Bankruptcy Court shall, until further order, perform the same or the like duties in relation to the business to be performed in the New London Bankruptcy Court as they have respectively performed in the Old London Bankruptcy Court; and that the said business shall be distributed amongst the before-mentioned Officers in the manner in which the business of the Old London Bankruptcy Court was distributed amongst them.

Given under my hand this first day of January, 1870.

HATHERLEY, C.

The judge will sit in chambers, to hear summonses, at eleven o'clock, and in court, to hear motions, at twelve o'clock, on Tuesday, January 11th, and on each succeeding Tuesday until Tuesday, March 22nd, inclusive.

All papers for motions in the Court of Probate must be left with the clerk of the papers in the registry of that court, at Doctors'-commons, and for motions in the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes with the chief clerk, in the registry of that court, at Doctors'-commons, before two o'clock on the preceding Thursday.

"Judge Pierce sent a jury out to deliberate the other day at Philadelphia, and received a note from the jury pen the next day that all agreed except one who communed with spirits, who told him the law bearing on the case was illegal, and they asked to be discharged. Spirits triumphant and jury discharged"—Chicago Legal News.

The members of the Bar at Cape Town appear to have suffered a wrong and an indignity. The Basutos, who have attempted to seize certain debateable lands, and have suffered in armed contests, thought they might gain their point if they employed a barrister to plead their cause in London. They selected, no doubt wisely, Advocate Buchanan to be their pleader, but a curious difficulty defeated their intention. They had no money to pay the fee, and, accordingly, they set apart six hundred oxen to reimburse their lawyer. What the advocate would have done with six hundred kine we do not pretend to say. They would be more useful than the "handsome tigress" which the same Basutos have sent to Queen Victoria. Neither do we think a barrister's dignity is impaired should he receive his fees in kind, when his clients have no money. Governor Wodehouse, however, thought otherwise. He forbade the delivery of the oxen. Perhaps he suspected they were spoils of war, and the results of a raiding expedition. The matter will, of course, be investigated by the Bar, whose privileges seem to have been invaded.—South African Newspaper.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

At the commencement of the week all the markets appeared determined to begin the New Year with considerable animation. This buoyancy has been only partially maintained. Sales by speculators tended at one time to depress the railway market; which, however, still shows considerable activity. The funds have scarcely received the impetus usually accruing from the payment of so many dividends at this period of the year. Foreign securities are firm and improving.

The Trustees of the Nevada Freehold Properties Trust offer for adoption the certificates remaining unsubscribed. The price of issue is £2 each, with interest at the rate of 12½ per cent.; £1 to be paid on application, and £1 on issue of certificates.

The prospectus of the Parcels Conveyance Company, Limited, has been introduced. The capital to be raised is £20,000 in 10,000 shares of £2 each, but for the present not more than £1 per share is to be called up. It is considered that there is a demand for an increase in the means for conveying parcels between the districts of the metropolis and its outskirts.

Sir William Charles Hood, M.D., one of the visitors in lunacy under the Lord Chancellor, died at the Bridewell Royal Hospital on the 4th January.

625 deeds were presented for registration on the 30th and 31st ult., at the office of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy.

Among the law reforms of the next session it is supposed that a paid president and two paid judges for the Judicial Committee will be appointed; and among the names mentioned as likely to fill the seats are Sir Roundell Palmer, Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., and Mr. Dilke.—Echo.

ADVOCATES AND THE BENCH.—A few days ago, in the course of the trial of an adjudication case (at Yarmouth), reference was made by Mr. J. Clowes, solicitor, to the fact that the presiding magistrate's (Mr. E. Preston's) son, Mr. Isaac Preston, was pleading on behalf of one of the litigants. Mr. E. Preston expressed his indignation at his impartiality being called in question, and said that both Dr. Lushington and Sir R. Phillimore, judges of the Admiralty Court, had sons who practised before them. They would have been highly incensed had it been hinted that they could be unduly biased in consequence. Mr. Clowes said he did not impugn Mr. Preston's impartiality.—Cambridge Express.

RELEASE OF DEBTORS.—On Saturday 94 debtors were released from Whitecross-street Prison under the new Act to abolish imprisonment for debt, which came into operation on the 1st inst. It was supposed that it would have been necessary to apply to a judge at chambers on the subject; but Mr. Constable, the keeper, acting on advice, took a different view of the new law, and opened the prison doors after 12 o'clock on Friday night. As many as 94 inmates were informed of their privilege ushered in by the New Year, when 63 took their departure, and 31 asked to remain a little longer, and took their leave in the course of the day, with thanks for the consideration shown to them by the governor. Among the number who left about 11 o'clock on Saturday was an old named Barnacles, who had been a prisoner under an order from the Admiralty Court since the 7th of April, 1843—upwards of 26 years. On Saturday morning there were only 41 inmates in the place, on county courts and other commitments. Within the last week there were numerous commitments, and discharges were effected under the old law of bankruptcy.—Times.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite. The "Civil Service Gazette" remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in tin-lined packets, labelled—JAMES EPPS & CO., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.—(ADVT.)

The Directors are prepared to issue Debenture Mortgages repayable in 3, 5, or 7 years, or perpetual Debenture Stock—in any sum not a fraction of a pound—bearing interest at the rate of five per centum per annum. The Debentures and Debenture Stock are a first charge on the net earnings of the Company.

The present available borrowing powers, either on Debentures or on Debenture Stock, are £203,800, the interest of which at five per cent is £10,195 per annum.

During the three last half-years the balance of revenue, after payment of working expenses, was on

31st December, 1868	£10,432	19s.	0d.
30th June, 1869	£11,306	15s.	6d.

Being upwards of £21,500 per annum, or at the rate of more than 10 per cent. on the amount of the available borrowing powers of the company.

The interest will commence from the date the money is paid, and will afterwards be paid half-yearly, on the 1st of January and the 1st of July.

Applications to be made to Messrs. FENN & CAOSTWATTS, Stock Brokers, 50, Threadneedle-street, of whom further particulars and copies of the Company's last published accounts may be obtained.

Commission allowed to Brokers and Solicitors.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, JANUARY, 15, 1870.

THE RUMOURS respecting the proposed reconstruction of the Equity Bench have lately assumed a more definite form, though not one which can be considered less objectionable than that to which we formerly objected. It is now stated that arrangements have been definitely made for the transfer of Lord Romilly to the Court of Appeal, and for providing for the discharge of his present functions without appointing any successor to his present office. Our informants differ inter se as to how this is to be effected, and under these circumstances we do not think it expedient to comment on any of the plans suggested. They all involve the extinction of one of the present courts of first instance, and though, from certain very exceptional causes, it is made to appear that this can be done without detriment to the public interests, we are none the more satisfied that this is so. The last term has been marked by a peculiar dearth of litigation, of which there is no reason for anticipating any permanence, and the special circumstances which have retarded the progress of business at the Rolls during the present week are such as can, in the nature of things, but seldom occur. We are satisfied that to reduce the number of equity judges of first instance to three would be but a seeming economy, to be dearly paid for by an inevitable amount of business, with all its consequent delay and expense. But with the example of Somerset House and Portsmouth before us, we are not justified in supposing it less likely on that account.

Another rumour we have heard in connection with this question, at which, under ordinary circumstances, we should rejoice—viz., that it is proposed to reconstitute the Court of Appeal so as to make it consist of three permanent judges (who are always, or ordinarily, to sit together) and to relieve the Lord Chancellor of most of his present judicial duties. This is precisely what we long since advocated, nor do we see any drawback except the possibility that any piecemeal improvement may at this juncture interfere to retard the completion of the reforms advocated by the Judicature Commission. This would be a serious evil; indeed, the hope of the speedy advent of these reforms is almost the only consideration which renders endurable the present crippled condition of the bench, both at common law and in equity.

SEVERAL JUDICIAL DECISIONS have already been given, affecting the practice to be adopted in the new Court of Bankruptcy. The most important of these we report in another column. It will be observed that the chief judge has declined to lay down any general rule as to whether disputed adjudications are to be heard in court or in chambers, intimating at the same time an opinion, in which we think most people will concur, that where there is real litigation it had better proceed in the face of the public and in open daylight.

A very important rule of practice has been laid down as to debtors' summonses. For the future, when a debtor served with a summons denies the debt, and wishes to apply for the dismissal of the summons, the registrar, in fixing the time for hearing the application under Rule 23, is to fix it so as to give three clear days' notice to the parties, and if any extension of time for the hearing is needed, it must be asked for on proper grounds.

Section 13 of the Act empowers the Court to appoint a receiver at any time after petition presented. The chief judge has decided that this section only intends the case in which adjudication has not yet been made. This view commends itself to common sense, since the trustee may after adjudication do all the acts of a receiver, and until adjudication the registrar may do what the trustee could do.

We shall make a point of promptly reporting all decisions material towards the settlement of the new practice, with such comment as may seem advisable.

ON WEDNESDAY the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice Giffard delivered their reserved judgment in the case of the Family Endowment Assurance Company, affirming the decision of Vice-Chancellor James (18 W. R. 112); firstly, that that society is within the purview of the winding-up provisions of the Companies' Act, 1862, and, secondly, that General Pott, the annuitant who since the "amalgamation" with the Albert Society had been paid by the latter, was still a creditor of the Family Endowment. Upon the first point, we think that no reasonable doubt existed. The members had agreed to dissolve the society in 1861, and since then it had ceased to carry on business, and had no staff or place of business; but Lord Hatherley observed, that as long as anything remained to be done, or, we would say, capable of being done, for the adjustment of its affairs, either as regards members inter se or creditors, the society was within the purview of the 8th part of the Act. Lord Justice Giffard disposed very neatly of the argument that the company to be within the purview of the Act must be a company still carrying on business, by citing the analogy of the tests given in sections 79, 80. The second question is the one of real importance. The Court of Appeal, treating the question as one of fact, whether or no the annuitant had consented to accept the liability of the second society in place of that of the first, answered that question, as the Vice-Chancellor had done, in the negative. Both the Vice-Chancellor and the Court of Appeal observe that such a case differs widely from the case of the creditor of a firm or partnership, as to the strength of evidence necessary to prove an accepted substitution. The case of an annuitant receiving payments differs, as we have before observed, from that of a policyholder making them, because receiving cannot be evidence of recognition to the same extent that paying may be; but we think we can glean from the judgments now delivered that if General Pott had been paying premiums on a policy instead of receiving instalments of an annuity, the decision would have been just the same. Lord Hatherley says:—

"Something more is required, as it seems to me, to bring home to the annuitant a knowledge that by such payment, which might well be made out of the transferred assets, the new company intends to enter into a new contract with him for payment of his annuity out of a totally different fund.

"I have assumed that all the proceedings between the society and the company were warranted by their respective deeds, and there is no necessity for me to raise any doubt upon that subject, for my decision is independent of that question; but one cannot help observing the great difference that exists between an ordinary succession in a partnership and a transaction of this nature. In order to prove the acquiescence of a creditor to the change of his debtor he must be assumed to have satisfied himself that the substitution could legitimately be made—an assumption in the highest degree improbable.

"On the other hand, nothing could be more easy than for the new company, if it so intended, to obtain a clear recognition of their new contract by the General, or the equally clear rejection of it."

If "policyholder," be substituted for "annuitant," and if for "payments made out of the transferred assets," we substitute "payments carried to a separate account of the transferred assets," these paragraphs still govern the case. We are at the pains to point out this, because we have ourselves previously expressed the opinion that in general, policyholders who have been paying to the transferee company should be taken as having accepted its liability; it is therefore right that, writing as we do for the guidance of our readers, we should point out that that is not the view of the Court.

A SOMEWHAT UNUSUAL application was made to the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Bradlaugh v. De Rin, on the first day of term. The case was determined in that court (16 W. R. C. P. 1128) in 1868. The plaintiff appealed to the Exchequer Chamber, before whom a question arose as to a fact which had not been proved, and a referee was appointed to ascertain the fact.

The plaintiff tendered himself as a witness before the referee, but was objected to on the ground of his disbelief in a future state of rewards and punishments, and the referee refused to receive his evidence. The plaintiff then applied to the Court of Common Pleas for an order to compel the referee to receive the plaintiff's oath, or a declaration in lieu thereof. The court refused to act in the matter, on the ground that they had no jurisdiction, as they had not directed the inquiry.

It would seem that if any court has jurisdiction to make the order asked for, it must be the Court of Exchequer Chamber by whom the reference was ordered. As, however, the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 4), is now in force, by which persons objected to as incompetent to take an oath may make a declaration instead, the plaintiff ought to have no difficulty in giving his evidence. The 4th section of the Act exactly meets a case like the present, and it would appear that the plaintiff could obtain the benefit of its provisions without any application to the Court for that purpose.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS in a recent case of Re The Northern Assam Tea Company (18 W. R. 126), followed a rule laid down by Vice-Chancellor Malins, that, when a winding-up order is made, the nominee of the person who has the carriage of the order should be appointed official liquidator if there appear to be no material difference between the persons proposed for the office. On Thursday Sir Roundell Palmer applied to have an appeal from this decision heard by the Full Court of Appeal, on the ground that the question involved is one of principle, and that it will govern a number of other cases. The Lord Chancellor granted the application, and fixed next Tuesday for the hearing of the appeal.

THERE IS A WELL-KNOWN STORY of a jury who returned a verdict of "guilty, with some doubt as to the identity of the prisoner," after convicting, and of another who recommended the prisoner to mercy, "because they didn't think he was the man who did it." These are usually considered too good jokes to have actually occurred. If, however, the report in the Times of Wednesday last is correct, the first of the above verdicts has been equalled by one given by a jury at the Central Criminal Court on Tuesday. One George Woolgar, a policeman, was indicted for highway robbery in taking by force some money from a woman in the street. The jury, after three hours' deliberation, found a verdict of guilty, "with a strong recommendation to mercy on the ground of discrepancies in a portion of the evidence." Such a verdict requires no comment, but it is still more remarkable that, according to the report, the Recorder took that recommendation into his consideration in deciding on the sentence which ought to be passed.

That a jury should sometimes be illogical is not, perhaps, surprising, but a judge should know better. We must hope that there has been some inaccuracy in the report.

ON WEDNESDAY AN APPLICATION was made to the Lord Chancellor that an appeal from the decision of the Master of the Rolls in Re The Heyford Iron Works Company (18 W. R. 226), might be heard by the Full Court of Appeal. Our readers will remember that the question in the case relates to the effect of subscription of the memorandum of association of a company in the ordinary way, and a subsequent allotment of fully paid-up shares to the subscriber without his making any actual payment in money. The Master of the Rolls refused to follow the decision of the Lord Justice Giffard in Pell's case (18 W. R. 31), and expressed a wish that, if there were an appeal from his decision, it might be heard by the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justice. The Lord Chancellor acceded to the application, and Tuesday next has since been appointed for the hearing of the appeal by the Full Court.

OUR COLUMNS have recently contained a considerable amount of correspondence relating to the mutual relations of the two branches of the legal profession, arising in the first instance, from our having printed two papers on the subject recently read before the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Society. About a year and a half ago (12 S. J. 718), we recapitulated the reasons which induced us to dissent from those who desire "amalgamation"; and as the topic appears to have come to the surface again, we propose to trouble our readers with a few more observations next week.

IT IS ANTICIPATED that Mr. Justice Willes will retire from the bench during the present year. He was appointed in 1855, and will, therefore, shortly become entitled to his retiring pension.

THE BANKRUPTCY RULES.

No. II.

We pointed out in our last number the bearing of the more important of the new rules upon proceedings in bankruptcy down to adjudication. But since that time one of the points which we touched upon, and one of very great importance, has come before the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, Mr. Bacon. We have more than once explained to our readers that the process of adjudication contemplated by the new Act is evidently quite unlike that which formerly prevailed. The old adjudication was a private affair, which passed ordinarily quite sub silentio; the real contest, if any, arising at a later stage. Under the new system adjudication is to be of the nature of a judicial decision based upon evidence, and delivered after hearing both parties if they desire to be heard. When this change was to be made, it at once became evident, as we showed many months ago, that a question must arise as to where disputed adjudications should be heard, in open court, or in the privacy of chambers. The rules have left the matter undecided, and the question is reported to have been brought before the Chief Judge on the very first day of his sitting in the new court. If he be correctly reported, he prudently abstained from laying down any general rule on the subject, but suggested that in ordinary cases the hearing should be in private; though if the petitioning creditor's debt were disputed, or any other question suitable for a public trial were raised, a contrary practice might be adopted. And we may observe that, as by rule 36 a debtor who resists a petition in bankruptcy must give a formal notice, specifying which of the allegations of the petition he disputes, the parties must always be distinctly at issue before the time appointed for hearing, and the judge will be able therefore to see what the question to be determined is, and to judge what is the fittest mode of trial.

The rules governing the proof of debts seem to us to be in the main simple enough, and likely to work well; but they fall a little hardly, we think, upon secured creditors. A secured creditor, under the Act—and it is no more than common sense and common justice require—must either give up his security, or else hold his security and prove only for the balance due to him over and above the value of the security. By rule 78 such a creditor may do what he was empowered to do under the old law, that is, have his security realised by direction of the court, and then prove for the balance, if any. But it is plain that there may often be cases in which it would be very undesirable to realise a security at the moment of bankruptcy, especially as bankruptcies are very apt to occur in greatest numbers at the very time when all securities are most depreciated. In such a case the rights and duties of the creditor are determined by rules 99, 100, and 101. By them he is required, before he can prove or in any way act as a creditor, to assess the value of his security. To prevent his under-estimating its value, it is provided that the trustee may if he chooses, take the security at its assessed value. And this is probably fair enough, for there might be a substantial danger of secured creditors fraudulently undervaluing their securities in order to enhance the amount for which they may prove against the estate. And of course, in any case, if the security produces more than the estimate, the trustee is to have the surplus. On the other hand, if the estimate turn out to have been above the mark, and the security produces less than was calculated, the creditor is not to be allowed to increase the amount of his proof accordingly. This seems to us a little hard. An over estimate of a security is not likely to be made, except by an honest mistake. And it is scarcely reasonable that the holder of a security should be inevitably subjected to a penalty if he makes, however honestly, the smallest mistake upon either side in valuing his security.

Some of the rules introduced under the head of Trustees are of considerable importance; one or two of them indeed, if they are to operate as seems to be intended, may very likely, we think, be held to be ultra vires. Section 106 says that where no security is specified by the creditors under section 14 to be given by the trustee, "he shall be personally responsible in the performance of the duties of his office to the extent of the value of the property of the bankrupt." Now of course, with or without rule, the trustee would be answerable to the extent of this trust-property, and possibly even beyond it, as any other trustee is. But if it is intended to create any new and exceptional liability, surely it would need an Act of Parliament to do so. Rule 110 declares that "no person shall be entitled as against the trustee to withhold possession of the books of account of the bankrupt, or to claim any lien thereon." Is it to be supposed that this rule can take his lien from a bookbinder, who has had possession of the books to bind them, or an accountant to post them up? And if an action of trover were brought by the trustee against such a person, would any court in the kingdom give effect to this rule? The fact is, that the rule is an attempt to re-enact section 121 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, omitted in the new Act. The provision is no doubt a wise one, and its omission in the New Act was no doubt an oversight; but the attempt to make such an enactment by rule seems to us far in excess of the powers given to the framers of the rules.

Few parts of the rules are more important, or require more careful consideration from professional men, than those which relate to the discharge of the bankrupt. Everyone who is familiar with the Act knows that the course of events contemplated as the ordinary one is, that the estate should be realised, then the bankruptcy closed, and thereupon the bankrupt discharged. But let us see how it works out. By section 47, "When the whole property has been realised, or so much thereof as can in the joint opinion of the trustee and the committee of inspection be realised, without needlessly protracting the bankruptcy, the trustee shall make a report accordingly to the Court, and the Court, if satisfied, &c., shall make an order that the bankruptcy has closed." A copy of this order may be gazetted. By section 48, "When a bankruptcy is closed the bankrupt may apply to the Court for an order of discharge," which he is, under ordinary circumstances, to have if his estate has realised ten shillings in the pound. The rules (138 to 142) require that twenty-one days' notice of the application shall be published in the Gazette, and given to the trustee; and that no order of discharge shall be made till after the public examination of the bankrupt. Now, the result of all this is that the close of the bankruptcy is a matter simply between the trustee, the inspectors, and the bankrupt, and the discharge a matter between the trustee and the bankrupt, for the interference of the Court cannot, in the absence of opposition, be anything more than formal. There is no provision that the creditors shall have any real notice of either step, and even the inspectors, unless they read the Gazette regularly, may never hear of the application for discharge. The matter, however, is a very serious one. No doubt after the close of the bankruptcy and discharge of the bankrupt, such part of the estate as has not before been realised will pass to the registrar, who is to realise it if he can. But he will have lost all the special powers which make the realisation of a bankrupt's estate possible, and will know nothing about the property. So that we suppose everybody who knows anything of such matters will agree that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the close of the bankruptcy and discharge of the bankrupt will amount in effect to an abandonment of any outstanding assets. Now it seems to us that where certain assets have been realised, and there are other assets still outstanding, the general body of creditors ought to have a voice in deciding whether those assets should be practically abandoned by closing the bankruptcy, or the bankruptcy should be kept open in order to recover them. We do not complain of the rules in this matter. They are in accordance with the spirit of the Act, and creditors have the remedy in their own hands. Of course, only experience can positively decide what ought to be done. But we are strongly inclined to think that in every bankruptcy one of the instructions given to the trustee on his appointment, or subsequently, under sections 14 and 20 of the Act, should be, not to close the bankruptcy without the consent of a meeting of creditors.

The enforcement of debts against the after-acquired property of an undischarged bankrupt is another subject the rules as to which will naturally be looked to with much interest. Section 54 of the Act says that if a debtor fails to obtain his discharge, either at the close of the bankruptcy or within three years thereafter, then, at the expiration of the three years, "any balance remaining unpaid of any debt proved in such bankruptcy (but without interest in the meantime) shall be deemed a subsisting debt in the nature of a judgment-debt, and subject to the rights of any persons who have become creditors of the debtor since the close of his bankruptcy, may be enforced against any property of the debtor with the sanction of the Court, &c., but to the extent only and at the time and in manner directed by such court, and after giving such notice and doing such acts as may be prescribed" (i.e. by rule). The words which we have printed in italics were an afterthought, being inserted during the progress of the bill through Parliament, and looking at them in connection with the other words of the clause, and with the rest of the Act, the rules upon this subject were looked forward to with great interest. It was supposed, on the one hand, that something would appear showing how "the rights of persons who have become creditors since the bankruptcy" were to be secured, whether some mode was to be provided for securing payment of all such creditors in full, before allowing anything to the old creditors. It was further supposed that we should be told whether, as among the old creditors, the creditor who chanced to apply first, was to have it all his own way, or the ordinary rule of equality was to prevail; and if so, how it was to be secured. People expected to hear, in fact, whether every such application was necessarily to give rise in substance to a new bankruptcy, or whether something short of this, and what, was to occur. But those who expected any such information will be disappointed. The rules (183 to 185) simply provide that where any creditor makes an application for enforcement of the balance of his debt against the property of an undischarged bankrupt, unless the application be dismissed at once, the hearing shall be adjourned, and seven days' notice of the adjourned hearing shall be published in the Gazette and in one local paper. And at the adjourned hearing "the Court may hear all persons claiming to be creditors of the debtor before or since the close of the bankruptcy, and make such order in the matter as it thinks fit, or adjourn the hearing for further evidence." This is, as far as we know, without a parallel in the history of legislation. It is, we believe, the first time that a new jurisdiction has been created, without giving even a hint of the principles, either of law or of policy, which are to be acted upon by those upon whom it is conferred. And the persons upon whom this unheard-of responsibility is thrown are the registrars of county courts!

With regard to appeals, it is provided that any appeal must be entered within twenty-one days of the order appealed from.

It should be observed that affidavits in bankruptcy may be sworn either before any officer of a court of bankruptcy authorised to administer oaths, or before any person authorised to administer oaths in any of the superior courts; and an affidavit proving a debt may also be sworn before the trustee in the bankruptcy. It is a little curious to notice the provisions of Rule 152 as to the form of an affidavit. Affidavits have to be used in the county court chiefly in equity, in admiralty matters, and henceforth in bankruptcy. In equity the affidavit must state the deponent's "age, occupation, quality and place of residence;" in admiralty matters his "age, name, address and description;" in bankruptcy his "name, address and description."

We must postpone till next week the consideration of the rules which relate to the very important subjects of liquidation by arrangement and composition.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

Jan. 14.—Lord ROMILLY sat at half-past ten, to deliver judgment in the Berkhamstead copyholders' case of Smith v. Earl Brownlow, and having done so, rose for the day, there being no other business before the court. On Monday the court will pronounce judgment in the causes of Prettyman v. Swinnerton, and Swinnerton v. Prettyman; and on Tuesday in Ingle v. Goodwin. His Lordship has applied to the Lord Chancellor for a transfer of causes from the list of one of the Vice-Chancellors; so that in a day or two the court will doubtless be sitting as usual.

QUEEN'S BENCH.

In Re An Attorney.

Jan. 13.—Murray applied on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society for a rule nisi, calling upon an attorney of this court to answer the matters of an affidavit with a view to ulterior proceedings. The attorney was admitted in 1861, and continued to practice until 1865. In 1868 he applied to be re-admitted, and in the necessary affidavit he swore that he had not practised in the interval as an attorney, either in his own name or that of any other attorney; but it had since come to the knowledge of the Society that he had done so, and they considered it their duty to bring the matter before the court.

Rule granted.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Jan. 11.—The Chief Judge took his seat this day at the new court which has been fitted up for the purpose. The court is more commodious than either of the rooms heretofore used in Basinghall-street, though somewhat defective in regard to the accommodation of solicitors, and it is stated that the bar-room is wholly inadequate in size.

Re Morris Gregory.

Registration of a deed under section 192 of Act of 1861—Extension of time.

Reed applied for the extension of the time allowed for the registration of a deed of composition executed by this debtor. The affidavits showed that the deed, which bore date the 9th December, was tendered for registration under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, but the registrar, on the ground that no order had been granted extending the time beyond the 31st ult., declined to receive it. The matter was mentioned yesterday to Mr. Registrar Hazlitt, who referred it to the chief judge. It was stated that the twenty-eight days allowed by statute for registration having expired, the present application became necessary.

The Court now granted two days further time for registration.

The practice on the hearing of disputed adjudications.

Bagley desired to ask his Lordship what would be the future practice in regard to the hearing of disputed adjudications—would they be heard in private as had been the practice heretofore, or in public?

The CHIEF JUDGE said he knew of no reason why the present practice should be departed from.

Bagley mentioned the subject because the new Act provided that in certain cases an issue should be joined for trial by jury.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—That must be done in Court.

Bagley apprehended that there was no reason why the old practice should not prevail, because the credit of a person might be materially injured by the discussion in public of the question of whether he was a fit subject for bankruptcy or not.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—We are dealing with a great novelty, the practice is new to us all. As far as I can see at present the adjudication should take place in chambers as has been done hitherto, but there may be cases where of necessity an issue must be tried, which can only be done in Court.

Mr. Lawrance said the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, seemed to establish a new practice somewhat analogous to that adopted in the Court of Chancery. The petition was presented and heard, and the petitioning creditor must make out his case at the hearing, but it did not seem that the debtor would be prejudiced by the discussion of the subject in open court if no bankruptcy existed.

Bagley.—I cannot agree with Mr. Lawrance on that subject.

The CHIEF JUDGE said his opinion was if there was real litigation it would be better that it proceed in the face of the public, for he thought that the more of daylight was thrown on these cases the better. He did not want to lay down any new rule which might embarrass suitors hereafter; it would be better to deal with each case individually as it arose.

Bagley said that probably certain days would be set apart on which the Court would sit in chambers.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that no doubt that would be so.

Re a Debtor's Summons.

Practice—Rule 33—Time—Application to dismiss debtor summons.

Jan. 12.—Bagley, for the summoning creditor, applied to the Court under the following circumstances. On the 3rd inst. a debtor summons was issued under the provisions of the new Act, and on the same day was personally served on the debtor. On the 10th the debtor filed an affidavit denying the existence of any debt, and at his instance the 24th was appointed for the hearing. The learned counsel now asked that the time should be shortened, inasmuch as it would be perfectly monstrous that a debtor, a week after he had received the summons, should obtain fourteen days further time by merely making an affidavit in contradiction to that of the creditor. In these matters it was important that as little time as possible should be lost in determining the question of the debt, because, until that had been done, no petition for adjudication could be served on the debtor, who would still have a week further to dispute it. Reference was made to rules 17—24 under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

The CHIEF JUDGE, after consultation with Mr. Murray, the registrar attending him, referred to the 23rd rule, and said that in the first instance the registrar ought to give three clear days' notice to the debtor and creditor of the hearing of the application to dismiss the summons, subject to the state of the business before the Court, and any application for extension of the time might afterwards be entertained upon proper grounds. For the future this would be the practice.

Re Crouchurst.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 13.

Jan. 13.—This was the first case of an adjudication under the new law.

Mr. Thomas Phelps, on behalf of the petitioning creditor, applied for the appointment of a receiver under section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. It appeared that the bankrupt had carried on the business of a dealer in fancy goods, and it was desirable that a receiver should be appointed to carry on the business, and take possession of the property.

The CHIEF JUDGE was of opinion that the section applied to those cases only where a petition had been presented and adjudication had not yet been obtained. Until the appointment of a trustee the registrar could act as trustee, and could take possession of the estate and deal with it in the same way as a receiver would do. This being so, if a receiver was appointed the authorities might clash. His Lordship did not think it necessary therefore to appoint a receiver.

Re Wyatt.

Prosecution under s. 221 of Act of 1861.

This was an application on behalf of assignees for leave to prefer an indictment against the bankrupt, jointly with two other persons, for offences under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The matter had been brought under the notice of the registrar, and by him referred to the chief judge.

Reed supported the application, which was made ex parte, and referred to Ex parte Stallard re Howard, 16 W. R. 469.

The evidence having been referred to at some length,

His LORDSHIP granted an order for leave to prosecute the bankrupt for offences under the 221st section, but said that no order was necessary to embrace in the indictment the two persons alleged to be conspirators with him. The assignees might, if so advised, include these two persons, and then Ex parte Topping re Levy, 13 W. R. 445, would be an authority to the chief registrar to justify the payment of the costs of including them in the indictment.

New Orders.

The CHIEF JUDGE has delegated to Mr. William Hazlitt, Mr. H. P. Roche, Mr. J. R. Brougham, Mr. W. P. Murray, Mr. P. H. Pepys, and the Hon. W. C. Spring-Rice, the following powers:—

“With respect to the business of the old Court of Bankruptcy transferred to the new Court of Bankruptcy, under and by virtue of the said order of the Lord Chancellor, the said registrars shall proceed with the prosecution and winding-up of all business pending in the old Court of Bankruptcy on the 31st day of December, 1869, and for the purpose of prosecuting and winding-up such business shall, under and by virtue of this delegation, possess and exercise all the power and authority vested in the Chief Judge, except the power to make an order to commit a person for contempt.

“The said several registrars shall proceed with the prosecution and winding-up of the business so pending in the courts to which they were respectively attached on the 31st day of December, 1869.”

The Chief Judge has also appointed Mr. Charles Hansard Keene a registrar of the London Bankruptcy Court, to preside over the office for registration of arrangement proceedings.

For the present the Chief Judge will hold his sittings in Portugal-street on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays in each week, at half-past ten o'clock.

Mr. Edward Austin has been appointed clerk to the registrars and usher of the Courts in Basinghall-street, vice his brother, Mr. John Austin, appointed clerk to the Chief Judge.

COUNTY COURTS.

A report forwarded to us of a decision in the Birmingham County Court was not sufficiently complete for insertion.

Mr. James Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C., the recently appointed Law Member of the Supreme Council of India, took the oaths and his seat at the Council Board on the 14th of December last.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. JOHN FRANCIS COLLIER, barrister-at-law, of the western circuit, has been appointed Recorder of the borough of Poole, in Dorsetshire, in succession to the late Mr. Henry Bullar. Mr. Collier is a younger brother of Sir Robert P. Collier, the Attorney-General, being a son of the late John Collier, Esq., a merchant and shipowner, who was M.P. for Plymouth from 1832 to 1841, by Emma, fourth daughter of the late Robert Porrett, Esq., of North Hill House, near Plymouth. The new recorder was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in June, 1859, and practises at various sessions on the western circuit. Last year he acted as secretary to the Beverley Election Commissioners.

MESSRS. WALTER WILLIAM ALDRIDGE and EDWARD WILLIAM SYKES, of 49, Coleman-street, City, the Official Solicitors to the Court of Bankruptcy under the Act of 1861, have been appointed, by the Lord Chancellor, under the new Act of 1889, to act in all bankruptcies where no trustee shall be appointed, or during the vacancy in the office of trustee, and generally on behalf of the registrars of the Court, in cases where their services as such official solicitors shall be required.

MR. HENRY GREENE, solicitor, of Higham Ferrers, Northamptonshire, has been appointed by the Hon. G. W. Fitzwilliam, lord of the manor, to be Deputy Recorder and Steward for the town of Higham Ferrers, in succession to Mr. George H. Burnham, solicitor, of Wellingborough, resigned. Mr. Greene took out his certificate as an attorney in Hilary Term, 1828, and is solicitor and treasurer to the local Association for the Prosecution of Felons.

MR. THOMAS JOHN PROVIS, of Fareham, Hants, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking affidavits in the superior courts of common law.

MR. THOMAS DONNITHORNE, of 30, Gracechurch-street, E.C., has been appointed a London Commissioner for administering oaths in the courts of common law.

MR. WALTER OVERBURY, solicitor, of the city of Norwich, has been appointed by the Lord Bishop of that diocese to be a proctor of the Consistorial Court of Norwich.

MR. THOMAS WILLIAM ANSELL, solicitor, of Norwich, has been appointed by the Lord Bishop of the diocese to be a proctor of the Norwich Consistorial Court.

MR. MATTHEW GEORGE PENGREE, barrister-at-law, has been admitted as an advocate of the High Court of the North-West Provinces of India, at Allahabad.

MR. R. M. THOMAS, solicitor, of Calcutta, has been appointed Deputy Sheriff of that city for the ensuing year.

MR. JOHN C. AUSTIN, usher in the court of Mr. Commissioner Winalow, of the late London Court of Bankruptcy, has been appointed Clerk to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

“* A correspondent has a very strong impression that an author whose works we have twice reviewed during the last six years, is a person who has, as far as he could, lowered the status of the profession; and our correspondent cannot understand how it is that we notice the works of a person of such a class.

To which we reply:—We always have, and always shall, set our heel strongly upon improper conduct on the part of any member of the profession.

As regards reviews, it is our duty, for the information of our readers, to give reliable accounts of all works submitted to us, and our readers require for their information under this head, reviews, not of the authors, but of the books.

COUNTY COURT PROCEDURE.

Sir,—Passing over for the present the 5th and 6th questions of the Judicature Commissioners, we come to question 7, which relates to a matter of very considerable importance. The Commissioners ask:—“Does any, and what, inconvenience result from the county court judges having to administer justice upon three distinct systems? Could the proceedings be simplified by giving power to administer the several jurisdictions in one form of proceeding, irrespective of the question whether the suitor is entitled to his remedy under the equitable, the admiralty, or the common law jurisdiction; or should such power be subject to any and what special exceptions?"

I cannot myself imagine the possibility of this question being answered in any but one way. The more complex and various rules of practice are, the longer time it will take to master their details, and the fewer persons will be found to bestow the necessary trouble upon them. Whether regard be had to the judges who have to interpret, to the officials who have to apply, or to the counsel and attorneys who have to advise upon rules of procedure, nothing can be more important than that they should be framed in language the simplest, the shortest, the clearest, and the most uniform that can be adopted. Every hour that a busy lawyer is obliged to spend in "getting up" adjective orders and forms, is an hour withdrawn from the study or the application of the substantive principles of law; and certainly the wisest maxim on which the law reformer can act, at least in the present day, may be thus enunciated, "Take care to simplify the rules of procedure, and let the rules of law take care of themselves." Not only does the needless multiplication of forms cause a sheer waste of labour in the endeavour to read, mark, learn and inwardly digest them, but it becomes a fruitful source of error when even the most laborious practitioners are employed; and when experiments are tried to act without legal assistance, the hardy experimentalist almost inevitably "comes to grief."

If the above observations be considered applicable to the procedure of all courts of justice, they have a special bearing on the practice of the county courts. Those tribunals are peculiarly the courts of the poor suitor, who often cannot afford the luxury of a lawyer, or, at least, is obliged to rest satisfied with the doubtful aid of the less skilled labourers in the legal vineyard. To such persons a complicated system of practice is tantamount to a denial of justice, and the idea of their comprehending three different systems is simply ridiculous. Nothing, then, can justify the continuance of such a state of things short of clear proof that further simplification is impracticable; and the question whether such proof can be furnished will be the sooner solved if an attempt be made to contract an action at law with a suit in equity, as each is commenced, continued, and ended in the county court. I will select for this purpose two cases which intrinsically have many points of resemblance—viz., an action by a tradesman against the executor of his late customer to recover the amount of his bill, and an administration suit, brought either by a creditor or a legatee, against an executor. In the first case the defendant is summoned as "C. D., the executor of M. N.," to attend a court on a certain day to answer the plaintiff as per particulars annexed. Then follows the bill in the ordinary form of a tradesman's account. No written defence to this plaint, except under very special circumstances, is either necessary or allowable; but on the day of trial the defendant is asked on oath whether he admits his representative character, whether he disputes the demand, and if so on what ground, and whether he alleges a total or a partial administration of assets. In three minutes the judge understands the precise point or points in issue, and is then able to apply his mind to the evidence which bears upon them. Generally speaking the whole matter is settled almost in as short a time as it has taken me to write this account; but occasionally, where the defence turns on the due administration of assets, the defendant will not be prepared with all his proofs. In that event the hearing will be adjourned to a future day, when the cause will be finally disposed of by the judge. I say emphatically "by the judge" because I wish it to be distinctly understood that no reference is made to the registrar to examine and report on the executorship accounts, nor does he in any way interfere, except by making an official record of the judgment of the court. The entire proceedings take place in open court, the evidence is all given visd voce, there is no needless delay, there is no needless expense, there is no shifting of responsibility: the judge alone hears and decides.

From this very simple and very satisfactory mode of procedure let us now turn to consider an administration suit, conducted in conformity with the "County Court Orders and Forms in Equity." The first step is to prepare a plaint, which is playfully called in the Order "a concise statement of the grounds upon which the plaintiff seeks to obtain relief," but which, in the form given, condescends to tolerably minute details. It is divided into numbered sections, and contains allegations to the following effect:—(1) that A. B., late of —, was, at the time of his death, and his estate still is, indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of (inserting nature of debt); (2) that A. B. duly made his will dated, &c., and appointed C. D. his executor; (3) that the will was duly proved, &c.; (4) that the defendant has possessed himself of the personal estate of the said A. B. and has not paid plaintiff, &c.; (5) that the said A. B. died on —, and had his last place of abode within the jurisdiction of the Court; (6) that the whole of the personal estate, &c., does not exceed in value £500. Then comes a prayer that an account may be taken of the estate, &c., and that the case may be duly administered, &c., and for further relief, &c. If the plaintiff be a legatee instead of a creditor, the testator's bequest is inserted in one paragraph and its non-payment is alleged in another. To this flux of words—which substantially means no more than the common law formula "A. B. v. C. D. executor of M. N.," but which nevertheless is, in practice, often settled, if not drawn, by a skilled equity draftsman—the defendant in turn may transmit to the registrar a counter-statement, signed by himself, admitting or denying the allegations in the plaint, or raising questions of law upon them, or alleging new facts, or referring to new documents. True, he is not bound to take this course, nor, indeed, is it of any use; but still, it is not unfrequently taken, possibly because it affords a good opportunity for manufacturing costs. At length the case comes on for trial, and then, after a few questions have been asked and answered, the recognised practice is to make "a decretal order," that is, to refer the whole matter to the registrar, directing him to take and make some twenty accounts and inquiries; as for example, an account of the debts, an account of the legacies, an account of the funeral and testamentary expenses, an account of the personal estate realised, an inquiry respecting the outstanding estate, and so on, through two or three pages of instructions. When the registrar's certificate of the result is ready, if it ever arrives at that stage, it must lie in his office for a full week to enable the parties to inspect it, after which it will be presented to the court in due form, and the case will be ripe for a final decree.

Now, I submit, with confidence, that all this cumbrous machinery is quite out of character with the class of cases which come before the county courts. The executor of a village tradesman refuses to pay a small legacy because the legatee is wrongly described, or the subject matter of the bequest is not clearly defined. To decide such a point—and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the question really at issue is not more complex—written pleadings, and references to the registrar, and sittings in chambers, and inspections of certificates, and advertisements, and attorneys and counsel, are not required, but simply a little common sense, a little law, and, above all, a little patience on the part of the judge.

The above remarks deserve additional attention when applied to other cases over which the county court now exercises equitable or admiralty jurisdiction. For instance, why should not a suit for specific performance be commenced, as at common law, by a summons directing the defendant to show cause why he should not perform his agreement to buy such a house, or to take on lease such a farm? Why should not a partner bring his co-partner into court, by a summons directing him to answer a demand for a dissolution of the partnership, and a settlement of the accounts? Why should not a suit for foreclosure or redemption be dealt with in the same simple manner? Above all, why should not all these cases, as at common law, be disposed of by the judge alone?

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

BARRISTERS AND ATTORNEYS.

Sir,—Your correspondent, "An Advocate," has ably urged the necessity of some relaxation of the rule which compels the employment of barristers, and he has urged it mainly from an economical point of view. I venture to submit that the ruinous expense consequent upon this rule is by no means the worst of the evil. It has often fallen to my lot to feel how grievously interests are sacrificed by the present system—how miserably an attorney's efforts to put forward the strong points of his case are frequently thrown away—how hours and days of careful preparation are utterly wasted,—because every word of explanation and argument to the Court must be uttered not by the person who most thoroughly understands the points of the case, and who has laboriously mastered the details, but by one who, however clever and quick-sighted, has the disadvantage of obtaining all his knowledge of the case second-hand, and often at the shortest notice. This is bad enough when the advocate is really "clever and quick-sighted," but how, when he is the reverse? What attorney has not sat by and groaned to find, when it is too late, that his counsel has the haziest notions of the real features of the case; and which of us has not felt most bitterly the misery of being forbidden to utter the few simple words which would remove the cloud which threatens to enshroud judge, jury, and every one else?

Writing as an attorney, one naturally harps on the attorney's grievance; but if the attorney suffers in mind and reputation the public suffer in purse and pocket far more, and it is in their behalf, not merely as regards the question of fees, but as regards the interests of justice, that a remedy should be sought. This age has seen the removal of many old-fashioned prejudices, many time-honoured superstitions. The absurd notion that forensic wisdom can only be found in connection with a barrister's wig cannot long survive.

STAMPS ON BUILDING LEASES.

Sir,—It is impossible to draw (as the authorities seem to have done) a hard and fast line on the precise grammatical meaning of the words "valuable consideration" in the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 16, for if so any valuable consideration ultra the rent would of course subject the lease to the additional thirty-five shilling stamp. Covenants to repair, to grant, to insure, &c., are all in a sense "valuable" considerations beyond the rent, and yet no human being has up to this time conceived that they subject instruments to further duties, either in leases, mortgages, or anything else. The true principle would seem to be that you must stamp the document with the duty applicable to its main purpose and object, and so long as its provisions are merely subsidiary thereto, and inserted only to secure the more perfect working out of the main object, to treat them as covered by the duty so impressed. The Government taxes that to the extent it thinks fit, and there should be an end; any other construction would lead to consequences the most absurd, and no instrument would be safe without the extra stamp. A covenant to produce, to preserve boundaries, to respect your neighbours' lights, and so on, would thus make a second duty necessary, because it is valuable; but it is useless to multiply instances.

I would, however, go further, and say that in the case of building leases there is no "valuable consideration" within the words of the Act; for the "value" there contemplated, i.e., the value moving the lessor to make the grant, is the rent merely; the covenants insuring the security of the rent (and none of the usual covenants do more than that in one form or another) do not increase the rent itself, or make it, granted the solvency of the lessee, one whit more "valuable." Suppose the rent were secured by, say, twenty guarantors, to put its payment beyond all possible question, would the instrument be liable to a higher duty? This argument strictly holds good in all cases of underleases where there is only a nominal reversion in the lessor of no possible value. It has less application no doubt where the lessor is seized in fee and comes into a real reversion; but even here I conceive it should apply, for the value of the reversion on a ninety-nine years' lease is, at the time of the grant, so infinitesimal as to be not worth consideration—i.e., it would not be valuable, except on the most minute investigations.

I, in common with the rest of the profession, should be glad to see some judicial decision on the subject, because if it confirmed the present views of the authorities there must be legislation to remedy the evils past and to come; and if it overruled them there would be an end to the doubt and confusion now engendered. If the law be now correctly laid down by Somerset House, it is one of great hardship to builders, and will greatly tend to put a stop to the present growing and most convenient custom of taking up a lease for each house erected.

A BUILDER'S SOLICITOR.

LIFE POLICY—THE "DAYS OF GRACE."

Sir,—My attention has lately been drawn to the question whether an action upon a policy can be maintained against a life insurance company, in a case where the person whose life was insured died during the days of grace allowed for payment of the premium, and before the premium had been actually paid. Unquestionably, the common belief is that payment of a premium during the days of grace will operate for all purposes as payment on the appointed day; and, indeed, unless this is so, the risk of taking advantage of the days of grace is too great to be encountered. In Selwyn's Nisi Prius (12th ed.) vol. ii. p. 1044, the following passage occurs; citing the case of Simpson v. The Accidental Death Insurance Company (5 W.R. 307, 26 L. J. C. P. 289):—

"Where a policy is to continue, provided the assured pay the premium within twenty-one days of its falling due, this does not give the executors the right to pay it after his death, even though tendered within the twenty-one days."

Unfortunately, I have not a report of the case referred to, so as to be able to ascertain upon what the decision turned. The question seems to have been considered in a recent case in the District Court of Philadelphia (reported in your last week's number), but there the action appears to have been for a return of premiums on the winding-up of the company's business, and not for the amount insured by the policy. Indeed there is one passage in the report which may be taken as implying that the policy would be rendered void by "death occurring in the interval of non-payment," notwithstanding that the days of grace had not then expired. No doubt the point has long ago been settled, but I shall be glad to be referred to an authority.

Jan. 5, 1870.

A COUNTRY SOLICITOR.

[The answer to the question—whether or no the representatives of the assured can claim to pay after his death during the days of grace—must depend in each case on the custom of or terms provided by the company. The subject is fully discussed at pages 65 and 66 of Mr. Bunyon's work on Life Assurance, from which it appears that whatever the conditions may be, they will be strictly enforced, at least at law. So in Acey v. Fennie, 7 M. & W. 151, the policy mentioned that the premiums were to be paid during "the life" of the assured, and he dying during the days of grace, it was held that his representatives could not pay the premium and take the sum assured. In Simpson v. Accidental Assurance Company, reported also 7 C. B. N. S. 297, the policy stipulated that default should not invalidate the policy, provided "he, the assured," paid the premium within twenty days. It was held that this did not give his executors the right to pay it after his death. And we imagine the rule to be that unless the conditions expressly sanction a payment by representatives after death occurring within the days of grace, the position of the assured is simply that during the days of grace he has the power of keeping up his policy by paying the premium, but that if he dies during the days of grace without having made such payment, the policy lapses.—Ed. S. J.]

STAMPS ON BUILDING LEASES, &c.

Sir,—Allow me to refer to my letter, and your comment on it, in your paper of the 11th ult. (pp. 108 and 116). I have now reason to hope that one of the law societies will promote an appeal against this new ruling at Somerset House, but at present no decision has been announced.

Many think that as this ruling concerns the profession generally (for all must have erred, more or less, if it be correct) the appeal should be promoted by one of its representative bodies, who—if unsuccessful there—would then go to Parliament for an Amending Act with greater prestige than after an appeal by an individual. If, however, the societies will not promote such an appeal I hope to be able to do so. I have had a lease, containing covenants to build, &c., adjudicated upon in readiness for entering an appeal, and several of your readers have offered to contribute towards the costs of it; but I shall be glad of further aid, so that if I have to appeal I may procure the best assistance I can at the bar without too great an outlay on my own part in a matter of such general interest to the profession at large.

I repeat, I will readily reply to any one who may desire further information, or it may be obtained on personal application to my agent, Mr. James Cowdy, 17, Serjeants'-inn, Fleet-street.

THE NEW PRACTICE AT WORSHIP STREET.

Sir,—In the Times of January 3rd appeared the following—[The paragraph quoted by "J. A. A." details the course recently adopted by the magistrates of the Worship-street Police Court, vide sup. 187].

By which it will be seen that the magistrates of the Worship-street Police Court have set an example which I submit ought to be followed by the magistrates of all other police courts.

It is a boon and protection to the public, and it is a right that solicitors, who pay £9 a year for their certificate entitling them to practice, have a right to demand.

Why magistrates who ought to be the first to uphold the law should day after day allow an Act of Parliament to be treated with contempt, I have always been at a loss to conceive. It is no uncommon occurrence to see reported in the daily newspapers that Mr. A. B. appeared for So-and-so and to find on referring to the Law List that no such name appears therein, and on further inquiry to find that A. B. is (or, which is much nearer the truth), says, he is clerk to C. D. an attorney, the said C. D. being frequently a person who allows various A. B.'s to practice in his name for a consideration.

Why the Law Institution, which is supposed to watch over the interests of the profession have never taken up this question, I fail to understand; but a step has now been taken in the right direction, and I hope you will use your powerful interests so far as you can in preventing illegitimate persons practising as solicitors or advocates.

So far back as the 1st of March, 1862, you (in Vol. vi, p. 313, S. J.) wrote as follows:—

"It is enacted, by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 2, 'That no person shall act as an attorney or solicitor in any cause, matter, or suit, civil or criminal, to be tried, heard or determined, before any justice or justices, unless such person shall have been admitted as an attorney.' It is further enacted by the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 26, 'That every person who acts as an attorney or solicitor contrary to the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 2, shall be deemed guilty of a contempt of the court in which the action, cause, suit, case, matter, or proceeding, in relation to which he so acts is brought, had, or taken, and may be punished accordingly; and that he shall, in addition, forfeit, for every such offence, £50, to be recovered with full costs of suit, by action brought in the name of the Incorporated Law Society.'"

ASSIMILATION OF THE TWO BRANCHES OF THE PROFESSION.

Sir,—Your columns have for several weeks been, more or less, occupied by this subject, and I regret to see on the part of many of your correspondents and others a disposition to treat the question as one of rivalry between the two branches of the profession inter se, and not, as it really is, one of greater or less public advantage. The real question is—is it desirable, in the interest of the suitors, and without regard to its effect on the profession, in either branch, that the existing distinctions between the duties and privileges of the barrister and solicitor should be continued? I humbly conceive that it is; but I may be mistaken in this, and do not at present desire to discuss the point.

I do, however, wish to point out to those gentlemen who are now so loudly echoing Mr. Field's old outcry against "the autocracy of the bar," that the advantages of the existing system are by no means so one-sided as they seem to suppose. The first necessary result of the admission of solicitors as advocates would be, of course, to admit the bar to act as solicitors, and thus to sweep away at once two regulations, the combined effect of which has been to deprive the junior bar of many thousands of pounds; one, the rule of law which prevents a barrister from suing a defaulting client for his fees, and the other the etiquette of the profession which prevents him from dealing with the ultimate client direct.

Were I at liberty to refer to individual cases, I would point out within my own acquaintance gentlemen at the bar who would, at least, double their incomes at the expense of the other (I decline to enter into the puerile squabble respecting "higher" or "lower") branch of the profession, were these restrictions removed.

A. E. M.

BARRISTERS AND ATTORNEYS.

Sir,—In my letter which appeared in your impression of the 8th inst. I hazarded the assertion in a parenthesis that barristers form the "lower" branch of the profession. At first sight it may seem audacious to say such a thing, but I ask Sir, as our's is a learned profession, of what does the measure of a man consist? Surely his learning. Position, promotion, power and patronage may possibly force a man into a higher sphere in society I grant; but if his ignorance go with him he will make up for it by a bold assumption of wisdom's ways, and by blaming everybody but himself who makes a mistake; and so far from congratulating him we are compelled to deplore the state of our laws which puts him at so much pains to conceal his want of erudition. Yet, such is the position of a gentleman who is called to the bar, and this want of thorough and comprehensive legal education characterises him until he is raised to the bench. The painful exhibitions we have now and then on the bench must demonstrate this to every one. The superiority of a solicitor to a barrister consists in his learning.

An editor of one of our leading newspapers who is a barrister, in the course of conversation with me upon this subject ridiculed the very idea of barristers being called "learned." "It is true," said he, "that the public suppose we read a great deal, but the difficulty I have is in finding a man who has read anything." I will not go so far as this myself, but I am certain that the reason solicitors have a greater hold on the public is because their knowledge of the law is more various and extended. He is able in one matter—a liquidation for example—to bring his knowledge of the practice of Common Law, Chancery, Probate, Admiralty, Bankruptcy, and other courts to bear upon the subject, whereas a barrister would only be able to advise as to the practice of one. The learning barristers do attain cannot be relied upon until they have been practising some three or four years, and then woe betide the solicitor who first briefs them. His chances of success are as little as possible.

I have often canvassed the opinion of my professional brethren upon this subject, and in the end they generally agree with me, although at first they have a repugnance to any change. They very nearly always begin by saying that they find it a great advantage to be able to put the papers into another person's hands and to get his independent opinion.

True, but the answer is, "Could you not if you chose satisfy yourself by looking into the law of the case?" "Oh yes," he replies, "but still I could not go out of my office and lose the fees I make by my clients coming to consult me, &c., &c." "But you are now bound to attend court on the trial of your causes, and you might just as well do the work as do nothing." "Very true," is the reply. "I am, but then I might not succeed as I am not accustomed to advocacy; although I have no doubt I could do better than many counsel, and in fact, I am certain I should, for I have lost many causes through their sheer ignorance, pride and obstinacy . . . well, upon the whole, I think now it would be a good thing if we were allowed to plead in the superior courts." Such Sir is the vis inertiae in our profession, that it is almost impossible to get any reform noticed; or perhaps I should say that the labour is so great in comparison with the returns that no time is left for the consideration of any scheme for the general good. But I think it is clear that it is the duty of the Incorporated Law Society to take up the subject for us. They are, in a measure, responsible for our learning, and they ought to see that it has its due reward.

RETAINER TO COUNSEL.

Sir,—Perhaps you or some of your readers can assist us, as old subscribers, with a little information on the following point:—

A., the plaintiff in equity, gave a general retainer to a common law barrister; B., the defendant in equity, some time afterwards gave a special retainer in the suit to the same common law barrister. A. assigned a certain interest in the subject matter of the suit to C. and D., who filed a bill to obtain benefit of A.'s suit, and on the same day that the last-named special retainer was given, but within an hour or so afterwards, C. and D. gave a general retainer to the same common law barrister. Both suits were heard together, and one decree, directing certain inquiries, was made in them. On that hearing, nominal briefs only were given to the common law barrister. Both suits are now again coming on to be heard, and both parties desire to brief the common law barrister. Who is entitled to his services?

Yours, &c.,

ENQUIRER.

City, Jan. 12.

[Of course C. and D. can get no benefit from A.'s retainer.

As to their rights under their own retainer given an hour or so after B. had given his, it appears to us that by giving "nominal briefs" only to the barrister, each side dropped their retainer, and that in consequence the party first giving a special retainer after that event, is entitled to the barrister's services. For another case, see 12 S. J. 109.—Ed. S. J.]

OBITUARY.

MR. A. E. WATTS.

Mr. Alfred Eugene Watts, solicitor, formerly of Park-house, Sydenham, died at Penge, Surrey, on the 1st of January, after a brief illness, of disease of the heart. Mr. Eugene Watts was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1863, and carried on business both in London and at Romford.

MR. J. TIDD PRATT.

We have to announce the death of Mr. John Tidd Pratt, barrister-at-law and registrar of friendly societies in England and Wales, who expired on the 9th of January at his residence in Abingdon-street, Westminster. Mr. Tidd Pratt was born on the 13th December, 1797, and had, therefore, completed his 72nd year. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in Michaelmas Term, 1824, and since 1828 had held the office of consulting barrister to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. Besides being registrar of friendly societies, he was the barrister appointed by Government to certify the rules of savings-banks, &c. Mr. Pratt wrote and published, in 1837, a treatise on the "General Turnpike-road Acts, with Notes," and in 1846 he issued a "Summary of the History of Savings-banks." He also wrote "The Law relating to Friendly Societies," which appeared in 1855; besides "The Laws of Highways," "An Analysis of the Property Tax Act," "Suggestions for the Establishment of Friendly Societies," &c. He was included in the commission of the peace for Middlesex, Westminster, Kent, Surrey, Sussex, and the Cinque Ports, and was a Deputy Lieutenant for the county of Middlesex. Of late years Mr. Pratt was frequently consulted in his official capacity as to the soundness or otherwise of the various friendly societies in the kingdom, in which matter he became a general referee.

MR. J. B. GRINDON.

We have to record the death of Mr. Joseph Baker Grindon, solicitor, of Bristol, who expired on the 2nd of January, at the ripe age of eighty years. The late Mr. Grindon had been for nearly half a century one of her Majesty's coroners for the city of Bristol, having been formerly associated in that office with a gentleman named Langley, but for more than thirty years past he had acted alone. The deceased gentleman was the author of a work on the Coroner's Office, which has been quoted by judges of the superior courts, and he was regarded as an authority on all points relating to "crown's quest law." Mr. Grindon had acquired a large amount of medical, surgical, and scientific knowledge, and often astonished skilled witnesses by the pertinence of his inquiries and the shrewdness of his remarks. Some years ago, failing sight compelled him to abandon the active duties of his office, which were for a time conducted as his deputy, by Mr. H. S. Wasbrough, the present coroner. Finding no hope of renovated health, however, Mr. Grindon resigned the coronership about two years ago, when Mr. Wasbrough was elected to succeed him. Mr. Grindon's remains were interred on the 6th of January, in the burying-ground adjoining Bristol Cathedral.

MR. H. M. GRIFFITHS.

The death of Mr. Henry Moore Griffiths, solicitor, of Birmingham, took place at Solihull, Warwickshire, on the 11th of January. Mr. Griffiths was the senior partner in the firm of Griffiths and Bloxham, of Birmingham, and was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1829.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on Tuesday, the 11th inst., Mr. W. H. Herbert in the chair, a variety of business matters were disposed of; and, this being a quarterly meeting, the secretary made a statement showing the proceedings of the society during the past quarter. It was announced that 173 members were then on the roll, of whom 50 were members of the Incorporated Law Society, and 46 had passed their examinations with honour; also that 21 gentlemen had been elected as members during the past quarter; and that 7 had resigned. It also appeared that the attendance of members at the debates during the past quarter had been unusually good. Three motions relating to various matters were brought forward and negatived. The number of members present was 35.

Mr. Henry Bolland, for seventeen years an officer of the Liverpool Bankruptcy Court, first as usher and latterly as deputy-registrar, was on Wednesday, January 5, presented by the solicitors practising in Liverpool with a handsome testimonial, in the shape of a purse of 153 guineas, to be further increased by subscription. The presentation took place at the Law Association Rooms in Cook-street, the following gentlemen being among those present: Mr. Councillor John Yates (chairman), Mr. Councillor Woodburn, Mr. Yate Lee (Registrar of the Bankruptcy Court); Messrs. Timpron Martin (who acted as hon. sec.), Tidswell, Evans, Haigh, Gregory, W. Radcliffe, Jenkins, W. Morris, Gill, G. Norris, Lockett, W. Wareing, Frodsham, R. Norris, R. A. Payne, E. E. Weir Anderson, Collins, Samuel, Rogers, Charles Morris, C. Penberton, Bellringer, Thomas Martin, Copeman, J. Hughes, J. Pemberton, Tyrer, Barrell, Harris, Grimmer, Quinn, Worship, Brabner, G. Haigh, Moorcroft, Harber and Blundell (messengers to the Bankruptcy Court), &c.

RULES AND FORMS FOR REGULATING THE PROCEEDINGS IN THE COUNTY COURTS UNDER THE DEBTORS ACT, 1869, AND THE FEES TO BE TAKEN THEREON.

We, George Lake Russell, John Bury Dasent, John Worlledge, Rupert Alfred Kettle, and William Furner, being Judges of County Courts appointed to frame Rules and Orders for regulating the Practice of the Courts, and Forms of Proceedings therein, under the 32nd section of "The County Courts Act, 1856," have, under the powers vested in us by the said Act and by "The Debtors Act, 1869," framed the following Rules and Forms, and we do hereby certify the same to the Lord Chancellor accordingly.

The Rules, Orders, and Forms now in use in the county courts, numbered respectively 135, 136, 137, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, and 168, shall, on and from the 1st of January, 1870, cease to be used, and in lieu thereof the following shall, on and from such day, be the rules and forms in force and used in the said courts under the Debtors Act, 1869.

Interpretation.

In the following rules the word Act shall mean the Debtors Act, 1869; and the words "clear days" shall mean that in all cases in which any particular number of days is prescribed for the doing any act or for any other purpose, the same shall be reckoned exclusive both of the first and of the last day; and unless there be something in the context inconsistent therewith, the provisions of section 112 of the County Courts Act, 1846, shall apply to the interpretation of these rules.

Judgment summons.

1. No order of commitment under the Act shall be made unless a summons to appear and be examined on oath, hereinafter called a judgment summons, shall have been personally served upon the judgment debtor.

2. A judgment summons shall not be issued by a court unless the debtor resides or carries on business within its district, or unless leave of the court under section 48 of the County Courts Act, 1856, has been obtained.

3. An application by a judgment creditor for the issue of a judgment summons under the Act shall be in writing, signed by the applicant or his agent according to the form in the schedule.

4. Where a judgment creditor desires to apply for a judgment summons to a county court other than the county court in which the order or judgment was obtained, he shall obtain from the registrar of the county court in which the order or judgment was obtained, a certified copy of the order or judgment in the cause, according to the form in the schedule, and file the same with his application.

5. Where a party desires to enforce by commitment in any county court a judgment, decree, or order of a superior court of law or equity, or of any other competent court, he shall obtain from such court an office copy of the judgment, decree, or order he desires so to enforce, and shall file such office copy, together with an affidavit of the sum then due thereon, with the registrar of the court of the district in which the party, against whom the same is to be enforced, resides or carries on business.

6. The registrar of the court to which the application for a judgment summons is made shall, upon delivery to him of the certificate of the county court, or office copy of the judgment, decree, or order of any other court, file the same and issue thereon a judgment summons.

7. Every judgment summons shall be according to the form in the schedule, and be issued not less than ten clear days, and be served not less than five clear days, before the day on which the judgment debtor is required to appear, except in the case provided for by the next following rule.

8. Where the person applying for the judgment summons shall state to the registrar that the judgment debtor is about to remove from his dwelling or place of business, or is keeping out of the way to avoid service, then the judgment summons may be issued and served at any time before the hearing: Provided that the court shall not act upon a summons issued under this rule, unless at the hearing the judge is satisfied, by evidence on oath, that at the time of the application for the judgment summons such party was about to remove from his dwelling or place of business, or was keeping out of the way to avoid service, in either of which cases service upon the party at any time before the time appointed for the appearance of such party shall be sufficient.

9. A judgment summons may issue without leave of the court, except in cases provided for either by section 48 of the County Courts Act, 1856, or by the last rule.

10. No successive judgment summonses shall be issued.

11. The hearing of a judgment summons may be adjourned from time to time.

12. Any witness may be summoned to prove the means of the judgment debtor, in the same manner as witnesses are summoned to give evidence upon the hearing of a plaint.

13. Upon the issue of a judgment summons against a party upon an order or judgment of the court issuing the judgment summons the bailiff of such court shall return into court any warrant of execution against the goods of such party which may have been issued in the cause.

14. Where a judgment summons is heard in a court other than the court in which the order or judgment was obtained, and an order is made by the judge of the court in which the judgment summons is heard altering the terms of the order or judgment, all payments under the new order shall be made into, and execution thereupon against the goods shall be issued by, the court which has so altered the order.

15. Where a certified copy of a judgment is obtained from the registrar of a county court, he shall make on the minute of the judgment a memorandum of having given such certificate, and no warrant of execution against the goods or judgment summons upon such judgment shall issue from such court, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court or registrar that no order has been made against the execution debtor in any other court.

Order of commitment.

16. An order of commitment made under the Act shall be according to the form in the schedule, and shall, on whatever day it may be issued from the registrar's office, bear date on the day on which the order for commitment was made, and shall continue in force for one year from such date and no longer.

17. When an order of commitment for non-payment of money is issued the defendant may, at any time before his body is delivered into the custody of the gaoler, pay to the bailiff the amount indorsed on the order as that, on the payment of which he may be discharged; and on receiving such amount the bailiff shall discharge the defendant, and shall within twenty-four hours after receiving such amount pay over the same to the registrar of the county court of which he is an officer.

18. The sum indorsed on the order of commitment, as that upon payment of which the prisoner may be discharged, may be paid to the registrar of the court from which the commitment order was issued, or to the gaoler in whose custody the prisoner is. Where it is paid to the registrar he shall sign and seal a certificate of such payment, and upon receiving such certificate by post or otherwise, the gaoler, in whose custody the prisoner shall then be, shall forthwith discharge such prisoner. And where it is paid to the gaoler, he shall, upon payment to him of such amount, together with costs sufficient to pay for transmitting such amount to the court under the order of which the prisoner was committed, by Post Office order, sign a certificate of such payment and discharge the prisoner, and such costs of transmission shall be part of the prescribed costs.

19. A certificate of payment by a prisoner shall be according to the form in the schedule.

20. Orders of commitment against the same party may be issued concurrently into more than one district; provided that the cost of one order only shall be allowed unless the judge shall otherwise direct.

21. On the hearing of a judgment summons, where a warrant against the goods has been issued, the costs of such warrant shall not be allowed as against the judgment debtor, unless the judge be satisfied that there was reasonable cause for issuing the warrant.

22. The costs of a judgment summons shall not be allowed against the judgment debtor, unless some order shall be made thereon; but where an order is made on a judgment summons the judge may, in his discretion, allow the the said Act, in respect of any debt due to a creditor, whose name and address, and the amount of whose debt was shown in the statement of the debtor produced to a meeting of his creditors, as required by such section.

Costs.

25. The costs which shall be payable by a person imprisoned under the Act shall be the fees directed to be taken in proceedings under the Act by any order of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury under the powers vested in them by the County Courts Act, 1856, and such fees shall be deemed to be and shall be the prescribed costs referred to in section 5 of the Act.

And I undertake to prove, to the satisfaction of the Court at the hearing, that the judgment debtor has or has had since the date of the judgment [or order] the means to pay the sum in respect of which he has made default, and that he has refused or neglected or refuses or neglects to pay the said sum.

[The remainder of these "Rules, &c.," will appear next week.]

The Right Rev. Harvey Goodwin, of Caius College, Cambridge, the new Bishop of Carlisle, and known to mathematical students as the author of "Goodwin's Course," is the son of the late Charles Goodwin, Esq., an eminent solicitor, of King's Lynn, Norfolk.

The Oxford Board of Guardians have fixed the salary of their clerk at £100 a-year, and have decided that he should be a solicitor or attorney. The election of a new clerk, in succession to the late Mr. H. Jacob, is to take place on the 20th of February next.

Mr. William Weedon, solicitor, of Reading, has issued an address to the freeholders of the county, asking their votes in order to secure the coronership of East Berkshire, rendered vacant by the death of Mr. Rupert Clarke. Mr. Weedon has for some years filled the office of deputy coroner. Mr. James William Smith, solicitor, of Maidenhead, is also a candidate for the office.

FEES OF MAGISTRATES' CLERKS.—At the Stafford Petty Sessions, on January 3, an important discussion followed the presentation of the report upon the question of paying clerks of petty sessions by salary instead of by fees. The Committee reported that if the Act empowering this were adopted, £26,424 would be claimed by justices' clerks as compensation, two-thirds of which would go to the Wolverhampton stipendiary district. As a royal commission with large powers had been appointed to report upon the whole civil and criminal law of the country, and as they would most likely take cognizance of this question, the Committee recommended that no action be taken at present. Mr. Spooner, stipendiary magistrate of South Staffordshire, gave some startling facts. He said that one clerk, in his own district, for sitting on the Saturday of each week, received an average income of £700 a-year. The chief clerks of the London magistrates, for attendance every day in the week, received £500 a-year, and the salary of the speaker's (Mr. Spooner's) clerk was £400. Now, he would give a few instances of the remuneration received by magistrates' clerks in the shape of fees in their own county. One gentleman, who sat three days a fortnight, got an average of £675; another, who sat one day a fortnight, received £425; a third, for one day's work a week, £470; and a fourth, £435.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The markets generally are lower than they had been expected to be, considering the amount of money shortly about to be dispersed among the public in settlement of the Government telegraph purchase. The funds and foreign securities commenced the week with some strength, but did not maintain it. The railway market has been low, and subject to small fluctuations. Considerable transactions are going on in telegraph shares, very high prices being obtained in some instances.

BREAKFAST.—EPH'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite. The "Civil Service Gazette" remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which saves us many heavy doctors' bills." Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in tin-lined packets, labelled—JAMES EPPS & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.—(ADVT.)
